PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SEVENTY-FIRST CONGRESS FIRST SESSION

SENATE

TUESDAY, June 4, 1929

Rev. Joseph Hillman Hollister, D. D., minister of the Chevy Chase Presbyterian Church of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O God, who hast breathed into man the breath of life and hast given to every life its spiritual height and spiritual depth, we pray that this day we may attain unto our spiritual possibilities; that to the affairs of men we may bring the wisdom of God; that from the frailties of humankind we rise to the strength of the most high.

We pray for the world, for our Republic, for our President, and for everyone who holds the high and noble office of servant of the people. And may God have to do with the beginning, the continuing, and the ending of this another day of service. In the name of Jesus Christ we pray. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. WATSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

TENTH ANNIVERSARY OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that 10 years ago to-day this body took one of the most memorable votes in its history and by a two-thirds majority submitted to the States for ratification the amendment to the United States Constitution giving suffrage to the women of this country.

I had the honor of serving as the chairman of the Woman Suffrage Committee of the Senate at that time and am glad to call attention to this tenth anniversary, which is to-day being celebrated by women in every part of the United States.

Twenty-three men who are now Members of this body have the distinction of having voted for the suffrage amendment in the Senate when it was passed on June 4, 1919, and I believe that I can say that every one of them will gladly bear testimony to the splendid results achieved by granting to women political equality with men. Everyone can now clearly see that the right of women to complete equality is convincingly demonstrated by the manner in which American women have borne their part in our national life since the suffrage amendment was adopted in the Senate 10 years ago to-day.

I congratulate women on their achievements in practically every line of endeavor and wish to say that I am proud of any service I may have been able to render them in their advance toward full equality with the male citizens of this country.

CLAIM OF THE ALLEGHENY FORGING CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, his report and recommendation concerning the claim of the Allegheny Forging Co., of Pittsburgh, Pa., which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS

Mr. WALCOTT presented a petition of members of Sarah Whitman Hooker Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of West Hartford, Conn., favoring the retention of the national-origins clause in the immigration law, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of members of the G. A. Hadsell Camp, No. 21, United Spanish War Veterans, of Bristol, Conn., praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Spanish War veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BUSINESS RELATIONS WITH SOVIET RUSSIA

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have been interested in reading an article of late in which a discussion is had as to the way in which business marches ahead of government. The government is ordinarily far behind the business world and often retards business. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD an article appearing in this morning's New York Times with reference to the business relations which are being built up between this country and Soviet Russia in spite of the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The article is as follows:

[From the New York Times, Tuesday, June 4, 1929]

SOVIETS HAIL DEALS FOR AMERICAN AID—CONTRACTS INVOLVING MILLIONS WITH INDUSTRY HERE ARE NOW EFFECTIVE—FORD COOPERATION LAUDED—STATEMENT BY MESHLAUK AND AMTORG TELLS OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE AND EXCHANGE OF PATENTS

Details of soviet contracts with more than 15 American concerns, involving millions of dollars, were made public yesterday in a joint statement issued by Valery I. Meshlauk, vice chairman of the Supreme Economic Council of the Soviet Union, and Saul G. Bron, chairman of the board of the Amtorg Trading Corporation, 261 Fifth Avenue.

Among the outstanding of these contracts is the one with the Ford Motor Co., signed at Dearborn, Mich., last Friday, at which time it was announced that this agreement calls for the purchase of $30,000,000 worth of Ford cars and parts by the Russian interests within the next four years. The other contracts call for designing of plants, technical assistance, and exchange of patents.

The statement issued yesterday at the offices of the Amtorg Trading Corporation, which was one of the parties to the Ford Motor Co. contract, said that "it is significant that American engineering skill is being utilized on many of the principal soviet industrial projects now under way."

The Ford contract, which is for a term of nine years, provides for technical cooperation between the Ford Motor Co. and the Soviet Automobile Trust for five years after the completion of a factory at Nizhni Novgorod, which is expected to be put in operation within four years, and which will produce annually 100,000 Ford cars and trucks. This plant will produce more trucks than passenger cars.

The statement pointed out that the Soviet Union possesses only 20,000 cars "and is probably the least advanced in this respect of any of the large European countries." The statement added that "an indication that the problem is receiving adequate attention is the fact that this year $150,000,000 has been appropriated for road construction" by soviet federal and local authorities.

Other contracts have been made with the following:

International General Electric Co., for exchange of patents and technical assistance.

Radio Corporation of America, for exchange of patents and other technical information.

Du Pont de Nemours Co., for technical assistance in building ammonia fertilizer factories.

Hugh L. Cooper Co., New York, consulting engineers on a $100,000,000 hydroelectric power plant in the Ukraine, claimed to be the largest in the world.

Freyn Engineering Co., New York, consulting engineers in the designing of steel mills to cost more than $1,000,000,000.

Stuart, James & Cooke, New York, consulting engineers for building new coal mines, rebuilding old mines, and installing up-to-date equipment.

Nitrogen Engineering Co., New York, for technical assistance in construction of nitrogen fertilizer factory.

Longacre Engineering & Construction Co., New York, for technical assistance and supervision on the erection of apartment houses in Moscow.

McCormick Co., New York, for the designing of a large baking plant in Moscow.

Albert Kahn (Inc.), Detroit, for designing the Stalingrad tractor factory to produce 40,000 tractors a year.

Arthur P. Davis, Oakland, Calif., chief consulting engineer on irrigation projects in Soviet Central Asia.

The statement issued yesterday said in part:

"We wish to state that in all of our conversations and negotiations with Mr. Ford he afforded us the maximum of cooperation and evinced a great interest in our industrial development, particularly in the application of automotive power to large-scale farming.

"The construction of the new automobile plant is a part of the general soviet program for the inauguration of many new industries in the country. A tractor factory with a capacity of 40,000 machines per year was started last year at Stalingrad, and construction of another tractor factory with a similar capacity is to be commenced shortly. The tractor plants at Leningrad and Kharkov are being re-equipped for larger capacities. Several large power plants are under construction, as well as many factories for the production of fertilizers, paper, electrical equipment, and other products."

FEDERAL FARM-LOAN BANK RATES OF INTEREST

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred, resolutions from one of the large farm organizations of my State relating to the rate of interest charged by the Federal farm-loan banks and the intermediate credit banks.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Federal land banks are increasing their rates of interest on farm loans; and

Whereas interest has been increased on intermediate-credit loans; and

Whereas this action on the part of these Government agencies is inconsistent at this time when Congress is called in special session for the purpose of bringing about relief to agriculture; and

Whereas any increase in interest rates at this time tends to relieve the farmer of what little resources he may have left: Therefore be it

Resolved by the State Board of Directors of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, South Dakota Division, in meeting assembled, That we respectfully petition Congress that they lower the interest rates rather than to increase them to bring about real relief to agriculture; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of our Representatives in Congress and United States Senators.

(NOTE.—At a meeting called at Mitchell, S. Dak., on May 29–30, 1929, all members of the board were present and the above resolution was passed by a unanimous vote.)

E. H. SAUBER,
Secretary, Yankton, S. Dak.

FARM RELIEF AND THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a resolution adopted by the Texas State Senate in reference to Muscle Shoals. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Simple Resolution 2

Senator Beck sent up the following resolution:

"Whereas agriculture is the chief industry of our Southland; and

"Whereas the marketing system for our crops is inadequate; and the fertility of our soil is being constantly depleted of its nitrogen contents; and the United States Government now owns a hydroelectric plant at Muscle Shoals, Ala., which cost more than $150,000,000, and is capable of manufacturing sodium nitrate so necessary for the rehabilitation of our soils; and

"Whereas at the present time Chilean nitrate sells at Texas points for $60 per ton; and the Muscle Shoals plant, if properly handled, will materially reduce the cost of sodium nitrate: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Senate of Texas, That our Representatives in Congress are urgently requested to support such measures that will give an adequate marketing system for our crops; and such measures that will permit the manufacture of nitrogen at the Muscle Shoals plant, thereby making it possible for our farmers to receive cheaper fertilizer: Be it further

"Resolved, That this resolution be printed in the journal, and a copy thereof be mailed to our Representatives in Congress.

"BECK.
"NEAL.
"WILLIAMSON."

HANDLING OF LIQUORS BY FOREIGN EMBASSIES

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain articles in reference to the shipment of liquors by foreign embassies. Before the request is granted I should like first to ask the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, if he thinks there is any possibility of getting a report on my resolution in reference to the matter at any time during this session of Congress or the early part of the next session?

Mr. BORAH. I do not understand what the resolution is to which the Senator refers.

Mr. BLEASE. The resolution to which I refer has to do with the handling of whisky and other liquors by foreign embassies. I have one such resolution with the Committee on Foreign Relations, one with the Committee on the Judiciary, and one with the Committee on Commerce. I am particularly interested just at this time in the resolution which is now before the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. BORAH. I do not believe there is any chance of a report on it at this session. It has been the idea of the committee that it would not take up controversial matters at the special session.

Mr. BLEASE. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that the resolutions are in the committees and that I have not forgotten them. I ask that the articles to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The articles referred to are as follows:

[From the Washington Post, May 6, 1929]

FOUR HUNDRED AND FIFTY "SPEAK-EASIES" FLOURISHING IN CITY, DOCTOR HOWARD STATES—EVIDENCE OF SURVEY GIVEN TO AUTHORITIES, HE SAYS IN CHURCH ADDRESS—FARMERS ACCUSED OF MAKING LIQUOR—LAW ENFORCEMENT CHAIRMAN SEES UNITED STATES FACING BLOODY RUM REVOLT

Evidence obtained in more than 450 "speak-easies" flourishing in the northwest section of Washington has been turned over to Capital authorities, Dr. Clinton N. Howard, chairman of the United Committee for Law Enforcement, said last night in an address before 400 members of the Clarendon (Va.) Baptist Church.

On Saturday, Doctor Howard said, his private investigators obtained evidence against 16 of the "speak-easies" which, he declared, are running openly in Washington.

Many farmers in Maryland and Virginia who, several years ago, depended on their crops for a livelihood, now are devoting their entire energy toward the manufacture of liquor, which flows unchecked into the National Capital, the speaker charged.

FACES RUM REVOLUTION

The United States is facing a bloody rum revolution, Doctor Howard said in speeches made earlier in the day at the Asbury Methodist Episcopal and National Baptist Churches, in Washington.

Crime is more rampant, life cheaper, and public opinion more indifferent to consequences in the United States than in any of the "benighted lands" to which missionaries are sent, he said.

DEPLORES RUM RUNNERS' TACTICS

The law enforcement chairman deplored the tactics used by the present-day rum runner, who thinks nothing, he said, of throwing bombs, releasing poison gases, and operating machine guns in the city streets throughout the country in the operation of his nefarious business.

Foreign powers who permit international rum smugglers to get their supplies in their countries, knowing they will be smuggled into the United States, are making a scrap of paper out of the American Constitution, Doctor Howard said. He plans to speak before the local policemen's association in the near future.

HOOVER WILL NOT SEEK TO BAR RUM FROM DIPLOMATS—ACTION WOULD CHANGE STATUS OF RIGHTS OF AMERICAN ENVOYS OVER WORLD—PLAN WOULD BE FOUGHT—SOME LEGATES WOULD CONSENT, BUT OTHERS RISE SOCIALLY BY SERVING LIQUORS

WASHINGTON, May 25.—Just when leaders of the diplomatic corps in Washington were becoming so frightened at liquor agitation over immunity privileges that they were willing to climb on the water wagon at any hint from the administration, it was made known to-day that foreign diplomats are to be masters of their own homes.

The United States will not ask foreign envoys to give up any of their privileges, including that of importing and consuming their favorite drinks. The property of each embassy and legation in the Capital is protected by extraterritoriality, making it "home soil" of each nation represented here. This country enjoys reciprocal immunities and privileges abroad and will make no move to upset this equilibrium.

The liquor question, which has been agitated here since early April, when dry dinners were started as a fad in Washington society circles, has been brought to the front again by a letter from Sir Esme Howard, British ambassador, to a Virginia prohibitionist stating his willingness to forego liquor privileges if any such hint should emanate from authoritative administration sources.

The letter was forwarded to the White House several days ago, and in the routine sorting of mail was forwarded to the State Department.

HOOVER WON'T ACT

Now that the nature of the letter has become known, President Hoover has requested that it be sent to him for study.

The President, however, contemplates nothing that could be construed as a hint. While appreciating the willingness to conform to laws of this country, Mr. Hoover is unwilling to disturb diplomatic equilibrium by a move that would bring endless governmental and social complications.

The diplomatic corps is far from united on the matter. Some members said they would be unwilling to forego their immunity. Others have suggested the compromise of serving no liquor at formal state functions. Several stand behind Sir Esme.

Most of the diplomats here would hesitate to lose the privilege chiefly because of the social prestige. Their American guests have learned to anticipate the wines and whiskys, and it is feared many of the guests would lose interest in the quest for embassy invitation if the oases of foreign territory here were dried up.

The opening has been created for a more or less determined fight by drys to detour the thirsts of envoys to water. James T. Carter, of Lynchburg, Va., prohibitionist and lumber manufacturer, who transmitted the personal letter from Sir Esme Howard to the White House, approached the President with a request that "necessary steps be taken immediately to accept the proposal of the British ambassador."

WROTE TO HOWARD

The gratuitous step by the British ambassador was written in answer to a personal letter from Carter, asking Sir Esme to "join hands with the better element of the people of the United States and try to help us enforce the liquor laws of our country." Sir Esme pointed out that the privilege of importing and using alcoholic beverages was granted voluntarily by the United States to foreign diplomats.

In a legal, as well as diplomatic sense, this Government could not officially suggest waiving reciprocal immunities without having the reciprocity withdrawn and nullifying the effect of past and future good-will tours.

Envoys have shared some of the general prohibition fears of the average American citizen, particularly those attachés who have accompanied truck loads of liquor from Baltimore, and who feared they might suffer the fate of some American bootleggers before they could flash their credentials and establish their immunity from rough-and-tumble tactics.

Secretary of State Stimson declined to express an opinion as to whether a law passed by Congress could affect the diplomatic corps. He pointed out that this question raises the old dispute as to whether treaty provisions supersede an act of Congress.

A high official of the French Embassy said that Sir Esme had not consulted other members of the corps. He expressed personal antipathy to waiving immunities. Representatives of five of the world's leading powers also vehemently denied that Sir Esme was speaking for any mission but his own.

It was generally conceded that Sir Esme could dry up the British Embassy if he so desires. Already, Carlos G. Davilla, the Chilean ambassador, has established a rule that wines and liquors are not to be served at his table when American officials are present.

[From the United States Daily, May 27, 1929]

SECRETARY CALLS ATTENTION TO IMMUNITY OF DIPLOMATS

Laws enacted by the United States have no effect upon the diplomatic corps in the Nation's Capital, according to an oral statement, May 25, by the Secretary of State, Henry L. Stimson.

Secretary Stimson's statement was made in connection with the statement of the British ambassador, Sir Esme Howard, dean of the diplomatic corps, that the diplomats would be willing to abide by any ruling of the United States regarding diplomatic liquor.

Commenting on the British ambassador's position, Senator HOWELL (Republican), of Nebraska, expressed the belief that "undoubtedly the administration will take advantage of his offer."

DIPLOMATIC RUM ANNOYING HOOVER—MANY CONFUSING SITUATIONS MAY ARISE FROM RUMPUS OVER HOWARD LETTER—BLEASE MAY STEP OUT—CAROLINIAN LIKELY TO BRING FORTH HIS RESOLUTION ON EMBASSY LIQUORS

By Charles Michelson

WASHINGTON, May 29.—Prohibition is surely the spiniest package of trouble that ever plagued a well-meaning nation.

Here President Hoover just had the thing put away comfortably with his law-enforcement commission, the eminence of the personnel of which only compares superlatively with the indefiniteness of its objective and along comes Sir Esme Howard, the British ambassador, and motivates the sharpest thorn that ever pricked a President.

The law-enforcement body was a perfect alibi for holding up any of the ordinary moves to reinforce prohibition. Congress appropriated $250,000 to start the President's investigation, and obviously if the Chief Executive was to accomplish anything he must not be interfered with by legislation that might cross the recommendations that the Wickersham committee may formulate. It looked like a long truce in the whisky war. But Sir Esme had to write to a bust prohibitionist who appealed to him to help us enforce the sacred law by setting an example of official abstention, and ingenuously explain that the diplomats were willing to waive their immunity if President Hoover would signify that he wanted them to.

Whereupon the correspondence is forwarded to the President with the mild suggestion that he follow the course the British ambassador had designated. Naturally the Anti-Saloonera indorsed the proposal leaving the President in the predicament of either offending the cause he championed or making this country ridiculous in the eyes of the diplomatic world, for what could be more loutish than for the ruler of this country to undertake to instruct the representatives of every foreign government as to their personal habits?

SOME SUSPECT REVENGE

If it had been anybody but the soft-spoken, discreet, politic, and experienced ambassador of His British Majesty, the suspicion must arise that it was not as guileless as it appeared. Cynical folks, familiar with the diplomatic attitude, might even see in the incident a comeback for the episode of the Vice President's official hostess, wherein the administration, while protesting that it had no function of telling the ambassadors and ministers how they should seat their guests, indicated that it expected Mrs. Gann to have the seat of honor.

They have wrangled ever since. They complied, of course, but Sir Esme, as the diplomatic spokesman, managed to get in three times in one note that it was a provisional submission, setting no precedent, and only valid until such time as the United States should realize its responsibilities and set up some constituted agency to decide matters of precedence.

Had his excellency been a malevolent person instead of the gentlest soul that ever represented a great nation in a foreign land he could not have conceived a more adroit revenge than comes from his courteous reply to a respectful communication.

At this writing it is the understanding that the President will take the easiest way out and attempt no interference with the Scotch-and-soda habits of the depraved Britishers. It is a question whether this wise decision can be maintained when the drys begin to ferment and Congress takes the matter up.

BLEASE MOTION

There has been slumbering in the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator COLE BLEASE'S resolution demanding the recall of all drinking envoys. The Carter-Howard correspondence will probably galvanize this mischievous measure into life. BLEASE could not resist such a chance. The South Carolina Senator, cheerfully explaining that he votes dry on his constituents' account, but drinks wet as opportunity offers, is horrified that foreigners should be able to do openly what good Americans can only do by stealth. Let the Anti-Saloon League get behind the bill and the drys will have to vote for it. Moreover, there will be recruits from the crowd that finds baiting the President the one joy of this extra session of Congress. These would be transfixed with delight at putting such an act up to President Hoover to veto. Fortunately for the dignity, though not for the gayety, of nations, the better subjugated House of Representatives can be depended on to check the process short of the ultimate, but there is due to be a lot of uncomfortable oratory on the subject meanwhile.

Suppose Tibet became independent, polyandry being one of the native customs—but why carry on the speculation any farther?

EMBASSY PARTIES

One immediate result would be that invitations to embassy dinners, now so eagerly sought for, would be a drug in the social market.

Actually the diplomatic liquor is the smallest item in the total of Volstead indulgence. The tales of its going into bootleg circles are fairy stories ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. The mysterious stranger who in broken English offers to supply you with embassy stuff gets his supplies from the same moonshine source that assuage the bulk of the great American thirst. At best he has a deal with a junk man for the empty bottles gathered at the legation back doors. The greatest harm that is done is the inciting of the plain people to a violation of the commandment forbidding envy.

This, however, does not alter the fact that Sir Esme Howard has given a great boost to the movement to stop those people from getting what we can't get. Probably he answered Mr. Carter, of Lynchburg, Va., with no deeper thought than a facile plea in avoidance, as the lawyers say. As time goes on he will be heralded as a convert to the dry gospel, and the Anti-Saloon League will point a mournful finger at Mr. Hoover's administration as having betrayed the faith.

Actually the foreigners have neither sympathy with nor understanding of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act. It is whimsically suggested that there be organized in England "The Friends of American Freedom" to match "The Friends of Irish Freedom" that functioned on this side during the home-rule troubles. They make treaties with us to discourage the smuggling of liquor into this country because we in compensation permit their wet liners to come into our ports, thereby giving them the cream of the passenger business, but brewing and distilling for the American market, is a thoroughly respectable and countenanced business with them.

WHAT WOULD HAPPEN

It is an interesting speculation to dream of what would happen if we insisted on the foreign diplomats complying with our law. The first question naturally is whether they would then patronize local bootleggers or put their own butlers into the lucrative trade. Not being subject to American legal processes the interrogatory arises whether our law could reach a bootlegger who was attached to a foreign legation, assuming that he was careful to take no customers outside the diplomatic corps? The envoy's baggage being exempt from examination, what would a customhouse official do if he encountered a leaking trunk, such as that which Congressman MICHAELSON's brother-in-law so heroically asserted ownership of on a recent occasion?

[From the Star, June 3, 1929]

SIR ESME LAUDED FOR LIQUOR STAND—MANUFACTURERS RECORD EDITOR TELLS ENVOY HIS OFFER WAS SERVICE TO UNITED STATES

The question of diplomatic liquor was again brought up to-day through publicity given a letter addressed to the British ambassador, Sir Esme Howard, commending him for his recently expressed willingness to refrain from exercising the privilege of importing liquors for the use of his diplomatic household.

"You have thus strengthened the ties between millions of American people who believe in prohibition and the Government which you so ably represent," Richard H. Edmonds, editor of the Manufacturers Record of Baltimore, declared in writing to the envoy. Sir Esme's now famous avowal to abolish liquor in the British Embassy, if so requested, caused other envoys in Washington to rise in defense of their diplomatic immunity and to take exception to his willingness to "waive" these rights, as expressed in a communication to James T. Carter, of Lynchburg, Va.

GREAT SERVICE SEEN

Doctor Edmonds's letter commenting on the envoy's action said in part:

"Your willingness to abolish in the British Embassy the use of intoxicating liquor as an expression of your interest in the desire to abide by the laws of this land if you should be so requested by the Government will command world-wide discussion; and though diplomatic usage will probably not justify such a request by this Government, you have, I am sure, rendered a very great service to the world-wide discussion of how to prohibit the use of intoxicating liquors, which have sent more men to the grave than even war itself, with all of its horror."

Mr. Edmonds made a defense of prohibition, quoting such industrial leaders as Henry Ford and the late Judge Gary, former chairman of the United States Steel Corporation, and Lord Leverhulme, one of England's greatest business leaders. He also pointed out that Robert Dollar, the steamship owner, has never permitted any of his ships to carry liquor.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter received from the Hon. Charles Nagel, former Secretary of Commerce and Labor during the administration of President Taft, relating to the national-origins clause of the immigration act of 1924.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. LOUIS, May 29, 1929.

Hon. ROSCOE PATTERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR PATTERSON: I feel that you will not take it amiss if I undertake to state to you my own position upon the question of national origin. For many years I have, contrary to the opinion of many people with whom I ordinarily agree, rather favored the restriction of immigration. My reason has been that the integrity of our institutions must be the first consideration. We can absorb a great many elements without danger and with advantage, but it does seem to me that we may introduce into our country elements that are not and for some period will not be in sympathy with the fundamental principles of our institutions in numbers so large as to actually present a problem and, perhaps, a danger.

I do not believe, however, that the national-origins statute in any satisfactory manner serves to carry out this fundamental idea. My reasons are these:

The general objection raised to this statute is that in result it works an obvious discrimination in favor of some countries and against others. I am frank to say that, to my mind, this objection is really sufficient because, without securing any particular advantage, the law does create ground for unrest, dissatisfaction, and racial controversy.

I am a member of the committee on immigration of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, and that question has been under consideration for a considerable period of time. The members of that committee represent different sections of our country, and, as I think it is safe to assume, approached the question without preconceived opinions. It is therefore rather remarkable that the conclusion against the national origins law—for the reason stated—was reached by unanimous vote of those present, two members being absent and not participating. At the annual meeting a few weeks ago in Washington that report was accepted by the committee on resolutions and was finally confirmed by the delegates at large without a single protest. I may say that this was not a perfunctory conclusion, because opportunity was given for the opposition for the fullest possible discussion in the committee on immigration and at the later stages of the proceeding.

My objection to the statute in question, however, goes farther. I feel that it is based upon assumptions that can not be sustained. It is admitted that no census can possibly give us a true picture of the origin and present composition of our people. The mere change of family names would be an insuperable obstacle. So much is accepted by the framers of the statute and they have therefore substituted the immigration records as a basis. In my opinion there are no such records, at least not for the better part of the last century, that give anything like a correct account of the nativity of immigrants. The shipping records would be equally unreliable. For illustration, the Pilgrims did not come from England but came from the Netherlands. If they are to be counted as Englishmen it will be because they came in an English ship. Carl Schurz and all his colleagues—who, perhaps, constituted the best element from Germany to this country—did not come direct from Germany, for obvious reasons.

If you will consult English authorities upon the question, you will find that the fallacy of the shipping records as a guide for immigration has been frankly recognized by them. I refer to Emigration from the United Kingdom to United States, 1763–1912, by Stanley C. Johnson, M. A. Publisher, George Routledge & Sons (Ltd.). See pages 100 and 101 and also 344–345. British Emigration to British North America, 1783–1837, by Helen I. Cowan, M. A. University of Toronto Library. See pages 234–235.

The second assumption is that having established the nativity of the original immigration in the manner just stated, the increase of these different stocks is assumed to have been in equal ratio. This assumption is manifestly untrue. The fact is just the opposite. The old stock has so obviously failed to sustain its ratio that it may be said that the very suggestion for this law is found in the desire to supply from a foreign country the shortage of the original stock in our own. If the reason for the law had been badly stated in that fashion, it would be truthful and might have some merit.

But if the purpose is to supply from abroad the shortage which exists in our country in the original stock, I submit to you that the plan can not accomplish the desired result. The fact is that Great Britain is in no position to supply Anglo-Saxons to this country, and that, after all, is what the statute is supposed to accomplish. Great Britain is just as short of Anglo-Saxons as we are. She has been a cradle of liberty for a very long period of time and, in truth, the British people are now as mixed a race as can be found on earth. A mere reading of her own distinguished men and women during the war and since then will show how heavy a percentage of her leaders is not drawn from the old stock which we generally have in mind. If Great Britain is to supply her quota, it will not be drawn from the Anglo-Saxon branch but it will come from those sections of her country which, in population, are composed very much as our congested districts are, of representatives of the different peoples that have found refuge there.

I am persuaded, therefore, that the law as it has been written is not based upon truth, and therefore not upon wisdom. I am persuaded also that if this law is retained it will create, and as I think justly, very great antagonism among our own people. It must be remembered that Mr. Hoover, as Secretary of Commerce, declared that the law could not be satisfactorily carried out. As candidate for President he declared frankly against it. That position on his part was accepted by a great many voters as an important factor in the determination of their position. I for one could not agree with Mr. Hoover about some of his planks, and unreservedly said so. His position upon this question disclosed an attitude of mind which particularly appealed to me, and I accepted it as one ground for my support of him. I feel that that question was fairly submitted at the last election and constituted a determining factor in the popular decision. Apart from all other reasons against that law, I feel that disregard of a principle so deliberately submitted and decided would now constitute very serious cause far unrest, dissatisfaction, and protest.

I am, very sincerely yours, CHARLES NAGEL.

THE NAVAL RESERVE IN 1930

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, from the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 61) to amend the appropriation "Organizing the Naval Reserve, 1930," and I submit a report (No. 26) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 61), as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provision in the appropriation "Organizing the Naval Reserve, 1930," reading "exclusive, however, of pay, allowances, or other expenses on account of members of any class of the Naval Reserve incident to their being given flight training unless, as a condition precedent, they shall have been found by such agency as the Secretary of the Navy may designate qualified to perform combat service as pilots of naval aircraft," is hereby amended to read as follows: "exclusive, however, of pay, allowances, or other expenses on account of members of any class of the Naval Reserve incident to their being given flight training unless, as a condition precedent, they shall have been found by such agency as the Secretary of the Navy may designate physically and psychologically qualified to serve as pilots of naval aircraft."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before giving my consent I should like to have an explanation of the purpose of the joint resolution.

Mr. HALE. When the last annual naval appropriation bill was before Congress the House cut out an item of $32,000 that was recommended by the Budget for the training of certain men in the reserve. These were older pilots, men over 35 years of age. The House thought it was not advisable to give them flight training. The Senate put back the item. When it came to conference, at the suggestion of the House, we incorporated the following language:

Exclusive, however, of pay, allowances, or other expenses on account of members of any class of the Naval Reserve incident to their being given flight training unless, as a condition precedent, they shall have been found by such agency as the Secretary of the Navy may designate qualified to perform combat service as pilots of naval aircraft.

It has since been found that if that provision stays in the law no student aviators may be trained because they can not qualify for combat service until they become pilots. The joint resolution changes the wording so as to provide as follows:

Exclusive, however, of pay, allowances, or other expenses on account of members of any class of the Naval Reserve incident to their being given flight training unless, as a condition precedent, they shall have been found by such agency as the Secretary of the Navy may designate physically and psychologically qualified to serve as pilots of naval aircraft.

Unless this is adopted the flight training of all the student aviators in the reserve, and there are about 209, will cease on July 1, and I am sure the Senate does not want that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether the joint resolution makes an increase in the appropriation?

Mr. HALE. No. There is nothing in it having to do with any increase in appropriation.

Mr. KING. It is merely to make eligible for certain service persons who are now ineligible?

Mr. HALE. Yes. They are ineligible simply on account of a mistake made by the conferees.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADMIRAL WILLIAM P. MAGRUDER

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] a question. I understood at the last session of Congress that the Committee on Naval Affairs attempted to investigate or was considering the question of investigating Admiral Magruder's punishment because of having written an article for one of the leading journals of the United States criticizing the naval administration and the improper or extravagant expenditures. Did the committee make such an investigation?

Mr. HALE. I do not recall that any resolution to that effect was referred to the committee. The Senator from Utah probably knows.

Mr. KING. I understood that of its own motion, because there was a great deal of feeling throughout the country that Admiral Magruder had been improperly dealt with, the committee intended or proposed to make an investigation. Does the Senator know whether Admiral Magruder is still unassigned?

Mr. HALE. I can not say.

Mr. KING. I shall later offer a resolution asking the committee to make inquiry into the facts concerning the punishment of Admiral Magruder and the reason why he is not assigned to duty.

PRINTING OF PROCEEDINGS AT UNVEILING OF STATUE OF WADE HAMPTON

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, from the Committee on Printing I report back favorably without amendment the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 13), submitted by Mr. SMITH on the 3d instant, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I may say that it is the customary resolution in matters of this sort.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed with illustrations, and bound, the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Wade Hampton, presented by the State of South Carolina, 5,000 copies, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of South Carolina.

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer and shall procure suitable illustrations to be bound with these proceedings.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, two measures have been under consideration by the Committee on Printing dealing with the subject of increasing the number of copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to be printed and distributed. The first bill was introduced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. It was similar to his bill which passed the Senate in the last session.

The Committee on Printing has given the whole subject considerable study. The result is that the committee thought a new bill should be drafted which would perhaps more fully accomplish the desired purpose and meet the needs of the future. I was directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the new bill (S. 1312), prepared by the committee and later introduced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], to amend sections 182, 183, and 184 of chapter 6 of title 44, of the United States Code, approved June 30, 1926, relative to the printing and distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I submit a report (No. 27) thereon. I shall ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration; but before doing so I ask that a brief report accompanying the bill may be read at the desk for the information of the Senate because it indicates the changes proposed in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read the report for the information of the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before the report is read I wish to say that the changes made in the bill are entirely satisfactory to me. There are some departments in the Government that ought to receive the RECORD and they had been overlooked. As the bill is now drawn it will include the various departments of the Government among those who are to receive the RECORD and will increase the number of copies of the RECORD to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 1312):

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1312) entitled "A bill to amend sections 182, 183, and 184 of chapter 6 of Title 44, of the United States Code, approved June 30, 1926, relative to the printing and distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD," having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment and recommend that the bill do pass.

This measure is a codification of the present law relating to the printing and distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and also provides that the copies now being delivered daily to various officers of Congress for official use, upon requisition of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House issued each year, shall be furnished by law.

The principal change proposed by this measure is to increase the number of daily RECORDS allotted to each Senator from 88 to 150 copies and to each Member of the House from 60 to 85 copies. It also provides that the libraries of those executive departments and independent offices not receiving the RECORD under the printing act of 1895, and such other Government agencies as may be hereafter created, shall be entitled to copies by statute and not be compelled to buy the necessary copies required for reference use in their libraries.

The committee has ascertained that many Members of Congress mail out their entire allotment of daily RECORDS and, consequently, do not have any bound copies left for distribution, as the present law provides that only Members having copies of the daily edition remaining to their credit may obtain the residue of their quota in bound form. This bill specifically provides that eight copies of the bound edition shall be allotted to each Senator and five copies to each Member in addition to the allocation made of the daily edition.

In the event that the demands made upon Members of Congress should be great enough to necessitate a daily edition of 27,500 copies, the Public Printer estimates that the cost to furnish this number during a short session of 74 days will be $114,770.30, and for a long session of 175 days, $271,416.25.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not ask for the consideration of the bill at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the calendar.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, a bill precisely similar to this has already passed the Senate at the last session. It is very necessary to get it through the Senate again as soon as possible, so that the House may also pass it, and we may have the additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for distribution at the beginning of the next session of Congress. A good deal of machinery will have to be put into operation after the bill shall have been enacted. The bill has been unanimously reported by the committee. I hope the Senator from Utah will let the bill pass.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I find myself almost always in opposition to the Senator from Alabama, and usually in harmony with the Senator from Utah, but I do hope that this bill may be passed.

To me it is a matter of great surprise sometimes, and always of interest, to note how many people want the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and who actually read it. I believe it is a very valuable publication, and I wish it might go into every home in America. Certainly, however, at least this limited additional number of copies, in my judgment, should be provided, so that some of the demands, at least, may be satisfied.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I am very anxious to see this proposed legislation enacted. I am amazed at the small increase in cost in comparison with the results to be attained. Every Senator probably has had the experience I have had of almost every day being compelled to refuse somebody a request for a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I believe the RECORD is read, and I think it is highly desirable that the number distributed shall be increased.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the reason why I interposed an objection at this time to the consideration of the bill was because I had hoped that when this matter was being considered we might consider also the question of what shall go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Many people have complained to me about the voluminousness of the RECORD. It seems to be a sort of—I shall not use an offensive term such as "dumping ground"—but a burying ground for editorials, articles, speeches, and addresses from all parts of the country, and relating to every conceivable subject. I have received a good many letters inquiring as to the reason why there is printed in the RECORD such a great variety of extraneous matter. If the committee having charge of the subject will consider the question as to what shall go into the RECORD, I shall have no objection to the consideration of this measure.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say, for the information of the Senator from Utah, that the Committee on Printing has been considering the very subject matter which the Senator has presented, and is in complete accord with his criticism and observations. The RECORD is becoming too cumbersome and the privilege of its uses abused. The committee feels that we are likely to meet with a situation which will result in a stringent rule being proposed by the House unless something shall be done to curtail the number of editorials, personal letters, articles, and speeches by outsiders that are inserted in the RECORD in the Senate. We are of the opinion that the House has been very considerate of the rule as to printing in the RECORD, and the laxity upon the part of the Senate in putting so many extraneous matters into the RECORD is regrettable and will certainly result in some drastic rule relative thereto. I hope Senators will not make it necessary for the Committee on Printing to propose any such rule, but will of their own volition use discretion and judgment as to the matters which they offer for printing in the RECORD. Senators should take pride in helping to make the RECORD a concise report of the proceedings of the Congress and not a conglomeration of extraneous and personal activities of Senators and their friends.

I will say again to the Senator from Utah that the matter which he has very appropriately called to the attention of the Senate will be further considered by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have accomplished the purpose which I had in mind, namely, to challenge attention to a matter which I think deserves consideration. I shall not, therefore, object to the consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1312) to amend sections 182, 183, and 184 of chapter 6 of title 44 of the United States Code, approved June 30, 1926, relative to the printing and distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 182, 183, and 184 of chapter 6 of title 44 of the United States Code, approved June 30, 1926, be amended to read as follows:

SEC. 182. CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, indexes: The Joint Committee on Printing shall designate to the Public Printer competent persons to prepare the semimonthly and session index to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and shall fix and regulate the compensation to be paid by the Public Printer for the said work and direct the form and manner of its publication and distribution.

SEC. 183. CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; daily and permanent forms: That the public proceedings of each House of Congress, as reported by the official reporters thereof, shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which shall be issued in daily form during each session and shall be revised, printed, and bound, as may be directed by the Joint Committee on Printing, in permanent form, promptly at the close of each session. The daily and permanent RECORD shall bear the same date, which shall be that of the actual day's proceedings reported therein.

Same; illustrations, maps, diagrams, etc.: No maps, diagrams, or illustrations may be inserted in the RECORD without the approval of the Joint Committee on Printing. All requests for such approval should be submitted to the Joint Committee on Printing, through the chairman of the Committee on Printing on the part of the Senate or of the House, in which the speech desired to be illustrated is delivered, and no maps, diagrams, or illustrations may be inserted that exceed in size a page of the RECORD.

Same; gratuitous copies; distributions: The Public Printer shall furnish the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as follows and shall furnish gratuitously no others in addition thereto:

Of the bound edition to the folding room of the Senate not to exceed eight copies for the Vice President and each Senator, and to the folding room of the House of Representatives not to exceed five copies for each Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner; to the Secretary and Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, each two copies; and to the Clerk, Sergeant at Arms, and Doorkeeper of the House, each two copies.

Of the daily edition to the Vice President and each Senator, not to exceed 150 copies; to the Secretary and Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, each 20 copies; to the Secretary, for office use, 25 copies; and to the Sergeant at Arms for use on the floor of the Senate, 50 copies.

To each Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, not to exceed 85 copies; to the Clerk, Sergeant at Arms, and Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, each 20 copies; to the Clerk, for office use, 35 copies; and to the Doorkeeper for use on the floor of the House of Representatives, 75 copies.

To the Vice President and each Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, there shall be furnished (and shall not be transferable) three additional copies of the daily RECORD, of which one shall be delivered at his residence, one to his office, and one at the Capitol.

All copies of the daily edition shall be supplied and delivered promptly on the day after the actual day's proceedings as originally published. Each order for the daily RECORD shall begin with the current issue thereof, if previous issues of the same session are not available.

There shall be printed and held in reserve by the Public Printer, in unstitched form, as many copies of the daily RECORD as may be required to supply a semimonthly edition for distribution as hereinafter provided, which shall be bound in paper cover together with each semimonthly index when the same is issued and shall be delivered promptly and without delay.

In addition to the foregoing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be furnished as follows:

To each committee of Congress, one daily and one semimonthly copy.

To each Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, one semimonthly copy.

To the President of the United States, for use of the Executive Office, 10 copies of the daily and 1 bound copy.

To the Chief Justice and each of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, one copy of the daily.

To the marshal and clerk of the Supreme Court, for office use, 2 copies of the daily, 1 semimonthly copy, and 1 bound copy.

To the office of the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, each, 4 copies of the daily and 1 semimonthly copy.

To the Sergeant at Arms, the Chaplain, the Postmaster, the superintendent and foreman of the folding room of the Senate and House, respectively, and to the two Assistant Sergeants at Arms of the Senate, each, 1 copy of the daily.

To the Official Reporter of the Senate and each of his assistant reporters, and to the Official Reporters of Debates of the House, and the assistant, each, 2 copies of the daily, 1 semimonthly copy, and 3 bound copies to each of these offices.

To the stenographers to committees of the House, 4 copies of the daily and 1 semimonthly copy.

To the offices of the superintendent of the Senate and House document rooms, each, 3 copies of the daily, 1 semimonthly copy, and 1 bound copy.

To the superintendent of the press gallery of the Senate and House, for office use, each, 2 copies of the daily, 1 semimonthly copy, and 1 bound copy.

To the offices of the Legislative Counsel of the Senate and House, and to the Architect of the Capitol, each, 3 copies of the daily and 1 semimonthly copy.

To the Senate and House libraries, each, 3 copies of the daily, 2 semimonthly copies, and not to exceed 15 bound copies.

To the Library of Congress, for international exchange, 125 copies, in both daily and bound form, and for office use in Washington, D. C., 20 copies, in both daily and bound form, and 5 semimonthly copies.

To the library of each executive department, independent office, or establishment of the Government now in Washington, D. C., or which may be hereafter created except those designated as depository libraries; and to the library of the Naval Observatory and the Smithsonian Institution, each, 2 copies of the daily, 1 semimonthly copy, and 1 bound copy.

To the office of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands at Manila, 10 copies in both daily and bound forms.

To the offices of the Governors of Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, five copies in both daily and bound forms.

To each ex-President and ex-Vice President of the United States, one copy of the daily.

To the governor of each State, one copy in both daily and bound forms.

To the Soldiers' Home and to each of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and to each of the State soldiers' homes now established or which may be hereafter created for either Federal or Confederate soldiers, one copy of the daily.

To the Superintendent of Documents, as many bound copies as may be required for distribution to depository libraries.

To each of our legations abroad, one copy of the daily, to be sent through the Secretary of State.

To each foreign legation in Washington whose government extends a like courtesy to our legations abroad, one copy of the daily, to be sent through the Secretary of State and furnished upon his requisition.

To each newspaper correspondent whose name appears in the Congressional Directory, and who makes application therefor, for his personal use and that of the paper or papers he represents, one copy of the daily and one copy of the bound, the same to be sent to the office address of each member of the press or elsewhere as he may direct: Provided, That not to exceed four copies in all shall be furnished to members of the same press bureau.

The Public Printer is authorized to furnish to subscribers the daily RECORD at $8 for the long and $4 for the short session, or $1.50 per month, payable in advance. The "usual number" of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall not be printed.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION FOR MAIL TRANSPORTATION BY RAILROADS

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 82) making appropriations for additional compensation for transportation of the mail by railroad routes in accordance with the increased rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I submit a report (No. 25) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution, which I ask may be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That to enable the Postmaster General to provide for the additional compensation due various railroad companies for inland transportation of mails in accordance with the increased rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission in case 9200, under orders dated December 8, 1925; January 5 and March 2, 1927; July 10, 1928; and February 9, 1929, the same being retroactive, the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:

For the inland transportation of mails by railroad routes for the fiscal years 1924 to 1929, inclusive, $39,000,000; and in addition to such sum there is hereby made available so much as may be necessary of the unexpended balances of the appropriations for inland transportation of mails by railroad routes for the fiscal years 1927 and 1928.

For payment of the judgments rendered by the Court of Claims and reported to the Seventy-first Congress in House Document No. 18, as follows: Under the Post Office Department, exclusive of interest as and where specified in any of such judgments, $3,997,089.50.

Provided, That any sums paid to a railroad company from the amounts made available by this joint resolution shall be considered for income-tax purposes as income for the taxable year in which such payment is actually received by such company: Provided further, That no part of the appropriations made available by this joint resolution shall be paid to any such company which does not waive all interest and claims for interest upon the principal amounts found to be due such company.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is that the measure which provides for an appropriation of something like $45,000,000?

Mr. WARREN. The joint resolution provides for an appropriation to cover the finding of the Supreme Court of the United States, and, pursuant to negotiations between the Post Office Department and the railroads, it is necessary that payment be made before the 1st of July, in order to avoid the payment of quite a large amount of interest.

Under the decision of the Supreme Court, $39,000,000 must be appropriated as additional compensation for the inland transportation of mails by railroad routes, and, in addition, there must be appropriated $3,997,089.50 to pay judgments rendered by the Court of Claims. So the joint resolution involves nearly $43,000,000.

The joint resolution is properly safeguarded in respect to the payment of income taxes by the railroads, and provides that the amount paid to the railroads under the joint resolution shall be considered for income-tax purposes as income for the taxable year in which such payment is actually received. The railroad companies get the benefit of having the amount paid in a lump-sum settlement rather than from time to time. On the other hand, the United States gets a substantial benefit by eliminating the item of interest, and so forth.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I wish to emphasize the point which I attempted to make when a former appropriation bill was under consideration. It was conceded then that the amount received by the Post Office Department from its activities was entirely inadequate to meet the expenses of the operations of the department, so that there was a growing deficit. Promises have been made from time to time that the deficit would be provided for by suitable adjustment of rates upon parcels post, upon letters, and so forth, carried by the department, but the evidence now is that not only is the deficit, large as it is, unprovided for, but is very much greater than was stated.

The appropriation proposed by the joint resolution is approximately $45,000,000. It is apparent that the deficit in the Post Office Department will approximate for the fiscal year from $60,000,000 to $80,000,000. It does seem to me, in the face of this situation, that there should be some readjustment of the rates, so that this deficit shall not be continued.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENLARGEMENT AND RELOCATION OF BOTANIC GARDEN

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 84) extending until June 30, 1930, the availability of the appropriation for enlarging and relocating the Botanic Garden. The joint resolution does not involve any further appropriation of money, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the appropriation "Enlarging and relocating Botanic Garden, 1928 and 1929," contained in the deficiency appropriation act approved December 22, 1927, is hereby continued and made available for the same purposes during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATION OF COMMUNICATION SERVICES

Mr. COUZENS. From the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I report back favorably with an amendment Senate Resolution 80, to investigate certain matters relating to power and communications in interstate and foreign commerce. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and that that committee give it prompt attention, so that it may be dealt with before the contemplated recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

IMPROVEMENT OF INDIAN CONDITIONS IN ARIZONA (S. DOC. NO. 16)

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, some communications, letters, and documents have been submitted to the Committee on Printing by the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. The committee reports unanimously in favor of printing this material. I therefore report from the Committee on Printing an original resolution providing for such printing and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 84) was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled "Letters Containing Recommendations Submitted by Various Committees of Citizens for the Improvement of Conditions on Indian Reservations and at Indian Schools in the State of Arizona" be printed as a Senate document.

WORKING CONDITIONS IN SOUTHERN TEXTILE MILLS

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Manufactures, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 49) authorizing the Committee on Manufactures, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, to investigate immediately the working conditions of employees in the textile industry of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 28) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HAWES:

A bill (S. 1373) granting an increase of pension to Frances E. McDonald (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN

Mr. NYE. I introduce a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States and ask that it may be read and properly referred.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 52) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE XX

"Men and women shall have equal rights throughout the United States and every place subject to its jurisdiction.

"Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REGULATION OF WIRE AND WIRELESS COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. COUZENS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 6) to provide for the regulation of the transmission of intelligence by wire or wireless, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO TARIFF BILL—ARTICLES EXPORTED, IMPROVED, AND THEN IMPORTED

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 2667, the tariff revision bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO TARIFF BILL—PROPOSED REPEAL OF SECTION 112 OF THE REVENUE ACT OF 1928

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 2667, the tariff revision bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

WAR-TIME RANK TO CERTAIN ARMY OFFICERS

Mr. TYDINGS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 414) to give war-time rank to certain officers on the retired list of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 465) to give war-time rank to officers and former officers of the United States Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

OPEN EXECUTIVE SESSIONS

Mr. NORRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the resolution (S. Res. 19) to amend paragraph 2 of Rule XXXVIII, relating to proceedings on nominations in executive session, which was, on page 1, commencing with line 5 of said resolution, to strike out the balance of the resolution and in lieu thereof insert the following:

Nominations and treaties shall be considered in open executive session unless the committee reporting on any nomination or treaty shall recommend that such nomination or treaty be considered in closed executive session. When the Senate is considering any nomination or treaty in closed executive session it shall be in order to move that the same be considered in open executive session, and if any such motion is decided in the affirmative by majority vote, then the further consideration of such nomination or treaty shall be in open executive session. All roll calls in closed executive session, together with a statement of the question upon which such roll calls are had shall be published in the RECORD. When in the consideration of any nomination by a committee charges shall be made against the nominee, the committee may, in its discretion, notify such nominee thereof, and the evidence taken at any hearing had thereon shall be reported to the Senate. The fact that a nomination has been made or that it has been confirmed or rejected shall not be regarded as a secret.

"THE HUMAN SCRAP HEAP"

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the May issue of the Railway Post Office entitled "The Human Scrap Heap," by Henry J. Ziehr.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Railway Post Office May, 1929]

"THE HUMAN SCRAP HEAP"

By Henry J. Ziehr, president New York City branch

Considerable discussion has prevailed of late in various newspapers and periodicals throughout the country on the present theoretical dead line as to a man's usefulness. The American Federation of Labor has also taken up the question, and no doubt will energetically press it in the months to come. It appears that the idea has taken root in the minds of far too many of the employers of labor that a man, in general, has outlived his usefulness for a livelihood after he has turned the age of 40 or 45. If this idea is not soon dealt with in some comprehensive way it may yet become a serious question. The idea itself is a fallacy and has no place in our American scheme of principles and ideals, where it has always been one of our most cherished thoughts that it was the right and privilege of each and every man to work and earn his livelihood. That is and has been one of the very foundations of Americanism as taught and practiced by our forefathers, and it should continue just so long as our system of government endures.

It may be true that with the passing of time we are faced with new problems, ideas, and evolutions as to man in relation to his work. The world is progressing with almost lightning rapidity. Advanced education, new inventions, and improved methods have all had the tendency to speed up production and displace man power with machinery. Nevertheless, a country such as ours, with untold wealth and unlimited industries, professions, and sundry opportunities, should ever have room for men in the prime of life to earn their daily hire. The average man at 45 has attained a period in life when employment is most vital to him. He has then passed through those most trying years of having established his permanent home, and given his children an education and training to enable them to also face the world's serious problems on their own initiative. As a reward therefor should he be thrown into the "human scrap heap" when he can still carry on? Mathematicians and efficiency experts are constantly reminding us that modern science has and is prolonging the longevity of human life, and if that holds true, then the age limit of a man's capacity to work should certainly not be reduced to as low as 45, and "old age" should not be considered as a matter of 40 or 50 years.

HEAVY RESPONSIBILITIES BORNE BY MEN BEYOND 50

The history of outstanding individual accomplishment will indicate that men beyond 50 have borne some, if not most, of the world's heaviest responsibilities, and have solved from time to time the most difficult and perplexing problems of destiny. Can there be a more burdensome responsibility than that of being Chief Executive of our United States, especially those of our Presidents who presided over the Nation's destinies in the time of our wars, and yet with only one exception these men all were elected to that high office at an age beyond 50? How many of the allied generals of the World War were younger than half a century? How many of the White House Cabinet to-day are only 45? Possibly only one, and they are all men responsible to efficiently represent the millions of our population.

President Hoover in New York recently spoke of the serious and apparent spreading of crime. I do not venture, with my small, limited ability, to solve so vast a problem, but I believe that I can safely say that at least one contributing cause of a man's downfall would be a premature enforced idleness. Just so long as a man has his daily task to perform, just so long will he be an asset to progress. Force him into early idleness, and his thoughts will drift into other less useful channels. If this idleness becomes indefinite to the point where his finances are menaced, then he may soon face the inevitable, either the poorhouse, theft, crime, or any of its subsequent consequences, if his will power weakens for a moment, as it might in times of trial.

QUESTION APPLIED TO RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE

Now, what has all this to do with a railway postal clerk? I have been thinking of this question in relation to our retirement law. I do not believe that the average clerk would want to leave his job at the early age of 45. But if 45 is becoming recognized as the dead line of usefulness, then why the retirement age in our service of 62? It should certainly be reduced to a more fair average. Accepting for a moment insurance statistics that the average age of expectancy is about 55 to 58, then the average clerk is still slated for from four to seven years of service beyond the death average. In other branches of the classified service a man's retirement is even more prolonged. Here we have the two extremes as to a man's capacity to live and work—uselessness at 45 as falsely considered on the one hand, and belated Government retirement at from 62 to 70 on the other hand.

There are many solutions that might be suggested or applied. For instance, the Department of Commerce for years has standardized production in all its branches. Shovels, nuts, screws, and what not have been reduced from thousands of kinds, sizes, and shapes to a necessary limited and useful number. Why not now give a thought to standardize in a humane way the welfare of the hands of production and establish a nation-wide 44-hour week or its equivalent, a living or rather a saving wage to every man for an honest day's work, and at least a reasonable assurance that a man of 45 has not reached his "old age" of usefulness (recognizing as well that life on earth is not eternal) by retirement at 58? This, as a Government standard to its postal employees, might well be a fitting example to other industries and employers at large. By its beneficial results, if nothing else, it would prove a good investment.

PROTESTS AGAINST PROPOSED TARIFF RATES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 82) submitted by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma May 31, 1929, as follows:

Whereas foreign governments have filed with the Secretary of State protests against the enactment of certain schedules and rates proposed in the pending tariff bill: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit such protests and communications now on file or which may hereafter be received, together with the comments or reports thereon from the Secretary of the Treasury, to the Finance Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have the resolution go over for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from Utah that the resolution has already gone over for a day under the rule, and this morning was handed down by the Vice President as a resolution coming over from a previous day.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not know that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order for the Senator to move to refer it to a committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I am aware of that, but I do not want to make such a motion. I am going to ask the Senator from Oklahoma to allow the resolution to go over for the day because I have not secured the information regarding it which I desire. I did not know the resolution was coming up to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the resolution going over for a day?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the only purpose I have in mind is to get these data from the Secretary of State. Personally, I should like to see them. However, if I can have some assurance that the protests, whatever they may be, will be obtained for the committee, and the members of the committee will have an opportunity to examine the protests, I shall have no objection to the resolution going over for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, let me suggest to the Senator, who is a member of the Committee on Finance, that the resolution be referred to that committee, and I will call the committee together just as quickly as possible.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is entirely satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; it should be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. No; by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

INTERNATIONAL PAPER AND POWER CO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 64) submitted by Mr. WALSH of Montana on May 22, 1929, as follows:

Resolved, That the report transmitted to the Senate by the Postmaster General pursuant to Senate Resolution 53, Seventy-first Congress, first session, be, with the report of the Federal Trade Commission to the Senate pursuant to Senate Resolution 83, Seventieth Congress, first session, No. 14, filed May 15, 1929, forwarded by the Secretary of the Senate to the Attorney General for such action as may be appropriate by the Department of Justice, and that the Attorney General be requested to advise the Senate what legislation, if any, is necessary in his judgment to make completely effective the provisions of the second paragraph of section 2 of the act approved August 24, 1912.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PUBLIC HEARINGS ON TARIFF BILL

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 78, submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE on May 29, 1929, as follows:

Resolved, That the Finance Committee, or subcommittees thereof, are hereby directed to hold public hearings on H. R. 2667—the tariff bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the chairman of the committee, seems to have left the Chamber; but in view of the fact, which I think is well known to all the Members of the Senate, that the Finance Committee, at a meeting yesterday, unanimously decided to hold open hearings through the agency of subcommittees of the committee, I can not imagine that there will be the slightest reason for the passage of this resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. EDGE. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is not here at this moment; and I suggest that the resolution go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will go over without prejudice.

Mr. EDGE. That course is satisfactory to me.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

CHANGE OF DATE OF INAUGURATION

The first business on the calendar was the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 3) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], I ask that the joint resolution may go over.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was about to move to take it up anyway, but I see that the Senator from Connecticut is not here.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator from Connecticut is out of the city.

Mr. NORRIS. I have put over this joint resolution two or three times to accommodate the Senator from Connecticut, who desires to be heard on it. The Senator from Connecticut has told me that he does not want to delay the matter; he wishes to make a speech on it. If I can have an understanding that the joint resolution will be taken up soon, within a day or two, I shall not have any objection to its going over again on his account. I do not want to take it up in his absence. At the same time I do not want continually to put it over every day.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Connecticut did not ask me to object.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I understand that; but I would not take up the joint resolution in his absence. At the same time I should like to have an understanding that we can get the joint resolution up and dispose of it. I do not think it will take very much time.

Mr. BLEASE. Personally I shall not object to its being taken up at any time; but I know that the Senator from Connecticut is very much interested in it, and that is why I made the suggestion.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, where is the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator is asking that question of me, I decline to answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senate ought not to be held up until the recess because some Senator is absent.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to dispose of this matter before the recess. I do not think it will take any longer than the time necessary to listen to the Senator from Connecticut. I have talked on it until the Senate does not want to hear me any more, and I do not care to make another speech on it, and I do not know of anybody else who does. I am ready to vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair suggest that the joint resolution, being No. 1 on the calendar, it is always reached whenever the calendar is up.

Mr. NORRIS. But we have been having recesses right along. If I can have an understanding that we will have a morning hour to take up this matter before the recess, I am willing to let it go over again. I will let it go over, anyway, Mr. President, and give notice that at the next morning hour that we have I shall try to get the joint resolution up for final action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF THE TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT

The bill (S. 60) to amend subsection (a) of section 26 of the trading with the enemy act so as to authorize the allocation of the unallocated interest fund in accordance with the records of the Alien Property Custodian, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives, to which he invites the attention of the Senator from Utah.

The bill (H. R. 3083) to amend subsection (a) of section 26 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended by the settlement of war claims act of 1928, so as to authorize the allocation of the unallocated interest fund in accordance with the records of the Alien Property Custodian, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this bill is identical with Senate bill 60, and I move to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, House bill 3083 is substituted for Senate bill 60.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not want the bill taken up at this time. I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over; and, without objection, Senate bill No. 60, Order of Business No. 5, is indefinitely postponed.

AMENDMENT OF SECOND LIBERTY BOND ACT

The bill (S. 310) to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives which will be read.

The bill (H. R. 1648) to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the House bill be substituted for Senate bill 310.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, House bill 1648 will be substituted for Senate bill 310.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, I ask that the bill go over, because the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] is not in the Chamber, and there is one item of the bill upon which he desires to speak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over; and, without objection, Senate bill 310 will be indefinitely postponed.

PAN AMERICAN UNION

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 5) amending the act entitled "An act authorizing the erection for the sole use of the Pan American Union of an office building on the square of land lying between Eighteenth Street, C Street, and Virginia Avenue NW., in the city of Washington, D. C.," approved May 16, 1928, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the act entitled "An act authorizing the erection for the sole use of the Pan American Union of an office building on the square of land lying between Eighteenth Street, C Street, and Virginia Avenue NW., in the city of Washington, D. C.," approved May 16, 1928, is hereby amended by striking out in section 1 the words

"bounded on the north by C Street NW., on the east by Eighteenth Street NW., and on the south by Virginia Avenue NW." and inserting in lieu thereof the words "bounded on the north by Virginia Avenue NW., on the south by B Street NW., and on the west by Nineteenth Street NW."

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 168) providing for the biennial appointment of a board of visitors to inspect and report upon the government and conditions in the Philippine Islands was announced as next in order.

Mr. BORAH. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 65) censuring the disclosure and publication of the executive proceedings of the Senate on May 17, 1929, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 15) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes,' approved May 22, 1920, and acts in amendment thereof," approved July 3, 1926, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

REHABILITATION OF FARM LANDS IN FLOODED AREAS

The bill (S. 1142) to continue, during the fiscal year 1930, Federal aid in rehabilitating farm lands in the areas devastated by floods in 1927 was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any unexpended balance of the appropriation to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the purpose of rehabilitating farm lands in the flood areas," approved January 26, 1928, contained in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes," approved May 16, 1928, is hereby reappropriated, and shall remain available for the same purpose during the fiscal year 1930.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will ask the author of the bill to explain it to the Senate.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, this is a bill simply to extend the time for expending an appropriation of $500,000 that has already been made. There is about $60,000 left unexpended, and the bill is simply to carry it over for that particular purpose for the States from Illinois down to the Gulf of Mexico. It has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF PURE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

The bill (S. 1133) to amend section 8 of the act entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicine, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have had a number of letters objecting to this bill. I am not sufficiently familiar with it to pass judgment upon the matter and I am not a member of the committee. I shall be very glad if the chairman of the committee or some member of the committee will advise us as to the provisions of the bill and the necessity of it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in my judgment the bill is so far-reaching that it should not be considered in this hurried way. I have no desire to delay action upon the bill, but I do think that some of its provisions should be thoroughly considered.

Mr. BRATTON. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF RULE XXXVIII—EXECUTIVE SESSIONS

The resolution (S. Res. 19) to amend paragraph 2 of Rule XXXVIII relating to proceedings on nominations in executive session was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am going to ask that the resolution may go over; but I desire to give notice that at the conclusion of the national-origins matter I hope to get the resolution up and dispose of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In other words, the subject will come up at the time originally suggested by the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. JONES. Thursday; yes.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I submit a substitute for Senate Resolution 19, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table, and also printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be received, printed, and lie upon the table, and also will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, is as follows:

Resolved, That all treaties and nominations when reported to the Senate shall be considered in open executive session, unless the committee reporting the same shall recommend that the treaty or nomination be considered in secret executive session, in which case it shall be so considered, unless the Senate by a majority vote in secret executive session shall determine that the treaty or nomination shall be considered in open executive session. All roll calls and pairs made in executive session shall be published in the RECORD.

Rule XXXV shall apply to all open executive sessions.

RESOLUTION AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. Res. 76) to amend Rule XXXIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate relating to the privilege of the floor was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This resolution will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 49) to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of the Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON (and other Senators). Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

SALE OF MORTGAGE BONDS BY DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COMPANIES

The resolution (S. Res. 58) to investigate activities of real estate and finance corporations in the District of Columbia concerning the sale of mortgage bonds upon property was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I understand that the resolution offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] was modified and another resolution reported by the committee. Is that correct?

Mr. BROOKHART. In answer to that question I will state that I think all of the matters included in my resolution are included in the new one, and the committee has enlarged it in some respects, I think very properly and appropriately.

Mr. KING. It meets with the Senator's approval, then?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; and it is a unanimous report of the subcommittee and the full committee.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with an amendment, to strike out the preamble and the resolution and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Whereas it is alleged that many millions of dollars of real-estate mortgage notes and bonds, secured by trust deed or otherwise, on real estate within the District of Columbia, have been issued, in excess of the value of the properties so mortgaged, and which securities have been sold throughout the United States through alleged questionable means and methods, to innocent purchasers, and that purchasers of homes and other real estate are denied their day in court in default of their payment of principal or interest; and

Whereas the laws for the District of Columbia are either absent or ineffective for the protection of innocent purchasers of such securities and homes and real estate, in the following particulars, namely:

(a) No adequate law relating to the issuance and sale of stocks, bonds, and mortgages, and other securities, as affecting real estate or otherwise;

(b) No law inhibiting unethical, unfair, and unscrupulous real estate and finance operators; and

(c) No law providing for an orderly foreclosure of trust deeds, mortgages, or contracts relating to the purchase and sale of real estate, through court procedure: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia, or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation in respect to the several matters hereinbefore set forth, including the issuance and methods of sale of stocks, bonds, or other securities of a different character than heretofore stated, and other relative or similar matters, and to report to the Senate as soon as practicable the result of its investigations, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-first Congress until the final report is submitted, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per 100 words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $2,500, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

SHORT-LINE RAILROADS

The bill (S. 571) to amend section 204 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1920, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments, on page 2, line 5, after the word "paragraph," to strike out "(h)" and insert "(i)"; and in line 6, before the word "If," to strike out "(h)" and insert "(i)," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 204 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1920, be amended and reenacted by adding thereto a new paragraph to be known as paragraph (i).

(i) If the claim of any carrier under this section is denied in whole or in part by the commission, the several district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction, upon a petition of such carrier to enjoin and set aside such action of the commission, to hear and determine questions of law arising upon such claims in the same manner and to the same extent as they now hear and determine questions of law in cases brought to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend in whole or in part any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the act entitled "An act to create a commerce court and to amend the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1910, as amended by the act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, and for other purposes," approved October 22, 1913; and the provisions of said act shall apply to all such proceedings under this amendment: Provided, That if the petition is for the enjoining and setting aside of any such action taken by the commission prior to the approval of this amendment, said petition shall be filed within one year from the time when this act is approved, and not after; and if the petition is for the enjoining and setting aside of any such action taken by the commission after the approval of this amendment, said petition shall be filed within one year from the time when such action is taken by the commission, unless within such period the carrier and the commission agreed in writing to suspend the running of the statute of limitations for filing suit from the date of the agreement to the date of the final decision in one or more named cases then pending before the courts.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, this bill is identical with the one which passed the Senate at the last session of the Congress. It relates to the short-line railways, and merely gives them an opportunity to have their claims for compensation considered and reported upon.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like the Senator to make a brief explanation in regard to this matter. My understanding was that the claims of the railroads against the Government and the claims of the Government against the railroads had been properly adjudicated through instrumentalities heretofore set up.

Mr. PHIPPS. That was the general impression; but the fact remains that certain short-line railways, when they were all taken over by the Government, were turned back at the termination of the 6-month period. The Railway Administration served notice that they would not be retained. The railways made their statements to the Railway Administration, and the Railway Administration refused to consider them. They were referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission, I believe—the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce will correct me if I am in error—and they were shifted back and forth between the two bodies, and have never had any consideration. This bill is merely to give them an opportunity to present their claims there to be heard. If they are entitled to anything under the law, it should be accorded them. Up to the present time they have had no opportunity whatever to present their claims to any authority.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PHIPPS. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. Referring to page 2 of the bill, it is provided that the act approved February 4, 1887, as amended by the act approved February 28, 1920, as amended and reenacted is amended "by adding thereto a new paragraph to be known as paragraph (i) as follows."

Referring to paragraph (i), does that authorize a carrier to apply to a United States district court at any point within the United States for an injunction to restrain the Interstate Commerce Commission from enforcing a decision previously rendered by the commission?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is the reading of the bill. May I have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce?

Mr. COUZENS. What is the question?

Mr. PHIPPS. Will the Senator from Michigan be good enough to reply to the question of the Senator from New Mexico? I suggest that the Senator from New Mexico repeat his question.

Mr. BRATTON. If I understand the new paragraph correctly, it authorizes any carrier anywhere in the United States to apply to a United States district court anywhere in the United States for an injunction to restrain the Interstate Commerce Commission from enforcing a decision previously rendered, and authorizes the court to enjoin and set aside the action of the commission, and "to hear and determine questions of law arising upon such claims in the same manner and to the same extent as they now hear and determine questions of law in cases brought to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend in whole or in part any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission." Is that correct? If that is the effect of the measure, it seems to me that it is too far-reaching to be disposed of without some discussion.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that for considerably over a year there were negotiations between the attorneys for the short-line railroads and the Interstate Commerce Commission concerning the language to be used in this bill, for the reason that the first time that the short-line railroads proposed this legislation the language of the bill did not satisfy the Interstate Commerce Commission because of the very questions raised by the Senator from New Mexico. After lengthy conference, and consideration by a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], and myself, we went into the controversy between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the attorneys for the short-line railroads, and agreed upon this specific language, which is entirely satisfactory to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Otherwise, the committee would not have reported the bill.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, notwithstanding the approval given by the Interstate Commerce Commission, I think the question involved is too wide in its scope to be disposed of in this manner. Accordingly I shall ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, we went into this matter quite at length at the last session and passed a similar bill. A bill in this identical language was passed at the last session and has been reported out unanimously by the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate.

Mr. BRATTON. Was it discussed at the time of its passage during the last session?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLean] went into it quite carefully and discussed it at the last session of Congress, it was unanimously passed at that time in exactly the same language, and twice has been reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Mexico will read the proviso at the end of the section, I think he will find that in part it answers his question.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. May I say to the Senator that this matter came up before the Committee on Interstate Commerce several terms in succession, and that it is the result of a dispute that was somewhat lengthy and involved. It took some time before the two sides could reach an agreement touching the merits of the matter. This very question of jurisdiction was discussed before the committee, as the present chairman, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], has remarked.

My understanding of the situation at this time is that this bill is the result of several years of conference on the subject, in which the matter, so to speak, was kicked back and forth, until finally an agreement was reached, as I understand the situation at the present time, entirely satisfactory to all parties concerned.

Mr. BRATTON. Was the committee unanimous in approving the bill?

Mr. WATSON. The chairman of the committee could answer that.

Mr. COUZENS. I might say that when the Senator from Indiana was chairman of the committee the matter was considered by the committee. The committee refused to agree until the Interstate Commerce Commission was satisfied that their jurisdiction was not affected and that their practice was not affected by the specific language referred to.

Mr. WATSON. I may say to the Senator from Michigan that the Senator from New Mexico asked me whether or not the Committee on Interstate Commerce was unanimous in reporting the bill, and I can not remember the vote.

Mr. COUZENS. There was no objection. At the last session of Congress, when the Senator from Indiana was chairman of the committee, the committee reported the bill out unanimously on the recommendation of a subcommittee, and at this session the committee was unanimous in reporting out the recommendation of the subcommittee.

Mr. BRATTON. Will the chairman of the committee, or the distinguished leader on the Republican side of this body, tell us the approximate number of claims in controversy, and which will be settled?

Mr. WATSON. I can not tell the Senator. Those figures have all escaped my memory.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over, on the objection of the Senator from New Mexico.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 549) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 550) to regulate the distribution and promotion of commissioned officers of the line of the Navy, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

PROMOTION OF COMMISSIONED OFFICERS OF THE MARINE CORPS

The bill (S. 551) to regulate the distribution and promotion of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in connection with the bills which have been passed over, and to which I do not object, I want to make a brief statement. They involve, in part, changes in retirement laws affecting Army and Navy officers which I consider of grave importance. It seems to me the retirement problem is one to which we should give immediate and very careful consideration. The younger officers of the Army and Navy must wait too long in the lower grades of service, and naturally their superiors are seeking to bring about promotions more expeditiously. The method proposed to relieve this unfortunate situation—for naturally a young man does not want to remain a lieutenant for the greater part of his life—is to advance the retirement of officers of higher rank. The result will be forced retirement at middle life for many officers. Many of these older officers do not want to retire at the early age that is now being suggested.

If this practice of steadily lowering the retirement age goes on, in my opinion we are going to find the same demand from civilian employees of the Government. Much perhaps can be said in favor of retiring Army and Navy officers at a younger age than at which civilian employees are retired, but that distinction will not be convincing to the civilian army of Government employees.

Some other plan must be worked out. We must find some useful service in nonmilitary positions, if necessary, for these Army and Navy officers rather than retire them at such an early age on the Government pay roll. The theory of retirement is that a man is incapacitated for performing his duties at a certain age or after certain years of military or civilian service, but we can not defend retirement at 45, 50, 55, or even 60 years of age.

We are building up a great list of retired Army and Navy officers, and also of civilian employees, and we are witnessing the spectacle of men from that list being appointed to high-salaried positions and confirmed by the Senate, notwithstanding the fact that we have retired them upon the theory at least that they were not capable of efficiently performing their duties.

I want to give warning as a real friend of these officials that if Army and Navy officials continue this drive to lower the age at which retirement may be made for the purpose of having younger men promoted—and I sympathize with them and realize the great importance of advancing them—they will have to find some solution of the problem other than advancing the age of retirement or they will drive the civilian employees into making the same demand, and then will come a move in this country to do away with all retirement. The retirement upon pay of Army and Navy officials and enlisted men and all other Government employees who have rendered long and faithful service to the Government has my approval and support, but I do see danger signals ahead if we go too far.

We must keep in mind somewhat the interest and viewpoint of the taxpayers. In my opinion the public will resent a policy of overgenerosity or a system that is based upon placing on the retired pay rolls larger numbers of officials and employees who are strong, active, and in the prime of life. I suggest these views for the consideration of those who make recommendations to the Congress with respect to retirement with pay of officials and employees. My thought is to prevent a revolt in the future rather than criticize the past.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I want to address a few remarks to the Senate in regard to Senate bill 551, to regulate the distribution and promotion of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps. Promotions in the Marine Corps are made entirely on the basis of seniority at present, until we reach the grades of brigadier general and major general. This bill provides for applying to the Marine Corps the same methods of promotion by selection and the same privileges of retirement that exist in the Navy. Most of the Marine Corps officers graduate from the Navy, but there is a great disparity in the matter of promotion between the two services.

It is provided that after an officer of the Navy fails of promotion he is retired at a certain age. A young man is not going to stay in the Navy as a lieutenant until he gets to be 50 or 60 years old. No man of any worth would do so. So the Navy had the old guillotine system, by which men were retired irrespective of their merits; so many were retired each year.

When I was chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate in 1916 we provided for a system of selection, by which officers were promoted from one grade to another after being tested by a selection board. An officer could not go from one grade to another without the recommendation of a selection board which designated those who were competent. The oldest officer among those selected as competent was the one who was promoted.

Under the practice in the Navy, after an officer got to be a captain at 55 or 58 years of age, if he was not promoted to be an admiral, and there was no chance of it, instead of letting the "guillotine" operate he was retired, I think on half pay, or some such arrangement.

There has always been a method of getting rid of men 60 years of age, because it is necessary that the younger men have opportunities of promotion and of having a chance to perform the services of the higher grades. After a man had served 30 or 40 years in the Army or the Navy it was considered very unjust simply to dismiss him without providing him with any compensation.

All this bill seeks to do is to apply to the Marine Corps methods of promotion in vogue in the Navy. There is provided an increase in number, but not of very many; the aggregate number in the Marine Corps, as I understand, is the same as in the Navy. The higher ranks in the Navy cost very little money. The pay in the Marine Corps and the Navy and the Army is now fixed on the basis of longevity, and consequently an increase from one grade to another amounts to very little. This entire bill would mean an expenditure of $121,000 the first year, the next year it would cost less, the next year less, and it is estimated that in four or five years it would mean a saving instead of being an expense to the Government.

The Marine Corps is one of the best and most efficient of our armed forces, and it does seem to me it is but right that those men who go to the Naval Academy and graduate, and select the Marine Corps, should not be retarded on account of a different method of promotion from that prevailing in the Navy.

The bill provides for an increase of one major general for the staff corps, to which the House did not agree. There are three brigadier generals in the staff corps, and they allow them to have one major general.

The staff corps has generally been considered one of the most efficient and responsible in nearly every military organization except the Marine Corps. General Ludendorff was in the staff corps, or, to be exact, he was the commissary general of the army of Germany during the entire war. The man in such a position has generally been an officer of ability. If a man who goes into the staff corps can never hope to be made a major general, no efficient man would want to go into that service. No man would want to belong to a corps where he could never attain to the highest honor. General Lejeune, the Secretary of the Navy, and everybody who has given the matter any study, is satisfied that there ought to be one major general in the staff corps of the Marine Corps.

There is one officer there who, if he is not promoted by the 1st of August, will never have the opportunity of becoming a major general, and that is General McCawley. General McCawley has for the last 15 or 20 years had charge of the commissary department of the Marine Corps. He expanded that corps during the war from 15,000 or 20,000 to 75,000, discharged his duties well and efficiently, and did not have any great surplus of supplies left on hand when the war was over, as occurred in other departments. He has had service in the Philippine Islands and during the Cuban war, and was breveted for courage on the field of battle.

The proposed action will not cost the Government anything. The only reason why I would like to have the bill considered at this time is that in August General McCawley retires on account of age, and this is the only chance he has of getting the highest grade to which an officer of the Marine Corps is entitled.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts and Mr. EDGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator knows I am not objecting to the bill in the first place, but I was calling attention to a situation which I think is helpful to the Army and the Navy. I fear very much——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Virginia has expired. If the Senator from Utah maintains his objection——

Mr. KING. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 412) to authorize the creation of organized rural communities to demonstrate the benefits of planned settlement and supervised rural development was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in the absence of my colleague the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate, I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 215) to amend section 13 of the act of March 4, 1923, entitled "An act to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services," as amended by the act of May 28, 1928, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over. That concludes the call of the calendar.

MEDICAL OFFICER FOR SENATE

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I would like to ask unanimous consent to call up a resolution which is now on the table, Senate Resolution 51. I desire to offer a substitute resolution dealing with the same subject, which I now send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York offers a substitute for the resolution to which he has referred, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Con. Res. 14), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby requested to detail a medical officer of the Navy for duty as physician to the Senate and House of Representatives; that expenses not exceeding $1,000 for necessary medical supplies and equipment for the use of such officer shall be paid one-half out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives in the manner prescribed by law.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the subject of an attending physician for Members of the Senate has been briefly referred to on previous occasions. An officer detailed from the Navy is now attending medical officer for Members of the House of Representatives and the concurrent resolution which I have now introduced merely provides that he may come upon the floor of the Senate also and render a similar service here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York is asking unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may we have it reported?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution may be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk again read the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York withdraws his Senate resolution and is now asking unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator explain the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine has objected.

Mr. HALE. Is this the resolution to assign a naval officer to the medical work of the Capitol?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes. I ask the Senator to withhold his objection for a moment.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. COPELAND. It is not proposed to ask for another naval officer. If I were asking for an independent person, I would ask that somebody from the Army be assigned on the theory that the Navy is already represented; but the Secretary of the Navy has assigned a man who is serving, and serving very acceptably, in the House. There is no reason why his activity should not extend to the Senate. Since the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] came into the Chamber I have found my practice here somewhat interfered with. It is really surprising how many calls are made upon me from time to time because I happen to be a doctor.

I have learned of the work of this naval officer in the House. He has rendered great service to the Members of the House in the way of advice. He is on call there, either on the floor or in the galleries, and under the operation of the concurrent resolution which I have introduced, if it shall be adopted, he would have the same privileges here. I have long believed, and I think Senators share the view, that it is a wise thing that there should be a physician on call in the Senate, because there have been, even since I have been here, occasions when the services of a doctor were very sadly needed. I can see no reason why anyone should object to this particular matter, and I hope the Senator from Maine will withdraw his objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. It does not involve the appointment of an additional officer or anything of that sort, but this officer is already on duty as a naval officer, and the resolution simply provides that he can be assigned here to the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. That is it exactly. I have no other thought, because if I were going to ask for an independent person I would think it only fair that the other branch of the service be recognized. This officer has ample time to take care of both branches of Congress. The expense involved is nothing except for medical supplies and medicines. I have put it at the nominal sum of $1,000, $500 to be paid out of the contingent fund of each House. It would seem to me the matter should receive favorable consideration.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon will state it.

Mr. STEIWER. Is the resolution offered by the Senator from New York a Senate resolution or a concurrent resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution as presented by the Senator from New York was a Senate resolution. The Senator has modified it by presenting a substitute, which is a concurrent resolution, and he asks unanimous consent that it may be considered in its new form.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I share in the conclusions of the Senator from New York upon the importance of the resolution. Senators are frequently taken sick and require the services of a physician. As the House has a physician in attendance all the time, there is no reason why the same privilege should not be accorded the Members of the Senate. I can hardly understand why there would be any objection on the part of any Senator to agreeing to the immediate adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it does not seem to me it is any part of the duties of a medical officer of the Navy to look after the health of the United States Senate. We are at the present time short in the personnel of the Medical Department of the Navy, and it is difficult to get as many doctors as we need in the Navy. Those who are in the Navy are doing all the work they can possibly take care of at the present time. While we might not have to have a new man appointed to fill this place, in any event it would take away whoever was appointed from some of the duties he is now performing. I do not think that it is a proper measure for the Senate to adopt, and I must therefore object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine maintains his objection.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. COPELAND. If we were taking a new officer, the objection of the Senator from Maine would be a very valid one. But this officer is already stationed at the Capitol and spends his time here. The Senator from Maine may be the first one in the Senate Chamber to need a doctor. In that case it would be a very splendid thing for the country if there were a doctor immediately available.

Mr. HALE. If the Senate needs a doctor, I think we ought to hire one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine maintains his objection.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen	Glass	McNary	Smoot
Ashurst	Glenn	Metcalf	Steck
Blease	Greene	Moses	Steiwer
Borah	Hale	Norbeck	Stephens
Bratton	Harris	Norris	Swanson
Brookhart	Hastings	Nye	Thomas, Idaho
Broussard	Hatfield	Oddie	Thomas, Okla.
Burton	Hawes	Overman	Townsend
Capper	Hayden	Patterson	Trammell
Connally	Heflin	Phipps	Tydings
Copeland	Howell	Pine	Tyson
Couzens	Johnson	Pittman	Vandenberg
Cutting	Jones	Ransdell	Wagner
Deneen	Kean	Reed	Walcott
Dill	Kendrick	Sackett	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Keyes	Schall	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	King	Sheppard	Warren
Frazier	La Follette	Shortridge	Waterman
George	McKellar	Simmons	Watson
Gillett	McMaster	Smith	Wheeler

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] and the fact that he has a general pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. HEFLIN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BLACK] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

AMENDMENT OF SECOND LIBERTY BOND ACT

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1648) to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], because of whose absence on a previous occasion the bill was temporarily laid over, is now present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the House bill having been substituted for the Senate, and being a short bill, I think it ought to be read, because I think it is of considerable importance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 754), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. (a) That in addition to the bonds and notes authorized by sections 1 and 18 of this act, as amended, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow from time to time, on the credit of the United States, for the purposes of this act, to provide for the purchase or redemption before maturity of any certificates of indebtedness or Treasury bills issued hereunder, and to meet public expenditures authorized by law, such sum or sums as in his judgment may be necessary, and to issue therefor (1) certificates of indebtedness of the United States at not less than par and at such rate or rates of interest, payable at such time or times as he may prescribe; or (2) Treasury bills on a discount basis and payable at maturity without interest. Treasury bills to be issued hereunder shall be offered for sale on a competitive basis, under such regulations and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and the decisions of the Secretary in respect of any issue shall be final. Certificates of indebtedness and Treasury bills issued hereunder shall be in such form or forms and subject to such terms and conditions, shall be payable at such time not exceeding one year from the date of issue, and may be redeemable before maturity upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Treasury bills issued hereunder shall not be acceptable before maturity in payment of interest or of principal on account of obligations of foreign governments held by the United States of America. The sum of the par value of such certificates and Treasury bills outstanding hereunder and under section 6 of the first Liberty bond act shall not at any one time exceed in the aggregate $10,600,000,000.

"(b) All certificates of indebtedness and Treasury bills issued hereunder (after the date upon which this subdivision becomes law) shall be exempt both as to principal and interest, and any gain from the sale or other disposition thereof shall be exempt from all taxation (except estate or inheritance taxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States, or by any local taxing authority; and no loss from the sale or other disposition thereof shall be allowed as a deduction or otherwise recognized for the purposes of any tax now or hereafter imposed by the United States or any of its possessions.

"(c) Wherever the words 'bonds and notes of the United States,' or 'bonds and notes of the Government of the United States,' or 'bonds or notes of the United States' are used in the Federal reserve act, as amended, they shall be held to include certificates of indebtedness and Treasury bills issued hereunder."

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Finance Committee considered the bill (S. 310) to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended, for which the pending House bill has been substituted. I think the bill has a great deal of merit, and I approve of all of it substantially, except subsection (b) in section 5, which refers to the exemption from taxation of certificates of indebtedness or Treasury bills. It exempts from taxation all capital gains in transactions relating to them.

All capital gains from transactions in any security are now subject to the income tax. Efforts have been made from time to time, and strenuous efforts are now being made to exempt capital gains from income taxation. The movement is particularly energetic at this time because of the great gains which have been made on the New York Stock Exchange. It may be said that literally hundreds of millions of dollars have been made in transactions on the stock exchange. If Congress should adopt the principle of exempting from taxation capital gains, the Government will have its revenue materially cut.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator from Michigan will agree with me that there is no inclination whatever, so far as the members of the Finance Committee are concerned, to adopt such a program. I know at this time, as the Senator has stated, that there is pressure being brought to bear from some sources to exempt all capital gains from taxation, but, so far as the Finance Committee is concerned, I do not know of a single member of that committee who would vote for such a proposition.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, notwithstanding what the Senator from Utah says, I have been here long enough to know that men change their minds. Under pressure I have known many Senators to change their minds. Minds may be changed now or changed later with respect to the taxation of capital gains.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Why should we now exempt the certificates and bills provided for in this bill from capital-gains taxation?

Mr. COUZENS. That is the very question I raised in the Finance Committee. I objected then, and I here now object to an entering wedge of any kind which would exempt from taxation capital gains, no matter on what sort of securities they might be made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator went even farther than that. As I understand the Senator's position is this: He would like to have stricken out the language:

> Any gain from the sale or other disposition thereof shall be exempt from all taxation.

Those are the words the Senator desires to be stricken out.

Mr. COUZENS. Those are the words to which I particularly object.

Mr. SMOOT. As to the bills themselves, and as to the Treasury certificates, they are exempt, and the provision just read by me refers to the gain that may accrue from them. The bill makes no other change, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is precisely the point. I think the Senator from Michigan is right about it.

Mr. COUZENS. That is precisely the point I make. This is the first attempt to exempt any form of security from capital-gain taxation.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. The object is perfectly obvious, is it not, that the bills will bear a rate of interest that much lower?

Mr. COUZENS. That argument is a very fallacious one, because the States can come in and claim the same exemption in the case of their securities. In other words, if the capital gain on these bills should be exempted from taxation there is no reason why every other Federal security and State and municipal securities should not have a similar exemption from capital-gain taxation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Michigan yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think there is one reason, I will say to the Senator, namely, that these are short-term bills.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMOOT. They would not be issued for longer than three months, and, more than likely, the Treasury would be in a position to take them up within 30 days after they were issued, or, at any rate, within 60 days, and in no event can the period exceed three months.

As Senators know, there are four dates on which income taxes are paid, namely, March 15, June 15, September 15, and December 15. These certificates and bills will be purchased in the market and the proceeds will be used to cover the expenses of the Government so that the Government will not have to issue bonds and will be able to save the amount of interest which would accrue between the time that the certificates or the bills shall be issued and the end of the respective periods when the income-tax payments are due.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COUZENS. Before I yield to the Senator from Virginia I wish to say that the argument the Senator from Utah is making does not touch the issue at all. There have not been very many occasions when I could commend the Treasury Department, but on this occasion I want to commend that department for suggesting this plan of short-time financing. I think it is a very commendable plan; but I disagree with the feature which has been injected into it and which has nothing whatever to do with the financial scheme properly considered of exempting capital gains from taxation.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will admit, will he not, that if the bills were exempt so far as capital-gains taxation is concerned, the Government could purchase the money through these bills a little cheaper than it otherwise could?

Mr. COUZENS. That may be said with respect to all Federal obligations. Why not exempt them all? I contend that this is merely an entering wedge in an effort to exempt capital gains from taxation. There is no more reason why these Treasury bills should be exempted from capital-gains taxation than that Liberty bonds or other obligations of the Federal Government should be so exempted.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. There is only this reason——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Utah in order that he may finish what he desires to say.

Mr. SMOOT. I say that the only reason is that these are very short time bills. I agree with the Senator as to the exemption of capital gains in the case of obligations that the Government has already issued and on which capital-gains taxes are paid, and I would not care if the principle were extended further; but, as I have said, the life of the Treasury bills under this measure will not on the average be more than 45 days. They will be sold in the open market, as I have already stated, and the Treasury Department thinks at least—and I rather agree with them—that with this provision in the bill they may be able to obtain money for the short periods of time desired at a little less rate and perhaps make more than would be gained by taxing capital gains which might accrue upon the bills.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not agree with the Senator from Utah in that respect. The Federal Government could borrow all the money it needs at a less rate if it exempted capital gains from taxation. It could borrow all of its money at a much less rate if it exempted its securities from all taxation, as State and municipal bonds are exempted.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan now yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I wish to ask both Senators whether or not the committee considered another aspect of this question which, in my view, is very much more serious than the tax phase of it, and that is the use of these short-time certificates for stock-gambling purposes.

It is a very well-known fact that in this frightful orgy of speculation which has almost paralyzed the legitimate commercial and industrial credits of this country, the speculators have been enabled to operate excessively and with facility because of a provision of the Federal reserve act that permits direct borrowings by the banks under the 15-day clause of that statute. It is now proposed to issue short-time certificates which will facilitate that sort of activity by the stock gamblers, which will enable them to buy from day to day these short-time certificates and have them rediscounted at the Federal reserve banks, and thus manipulate the credits of the Government in order to increase the credits of the stock gamblers.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator in that connection that I think he has not carefully considered the bill, for the reason that this provision does not provide for additional financing. It simply substitutes a non-interest-bearing certificate for an interest-bearing certificate. In other words, there is no additional financing whatever.

These bills, when sold, will be sold without any interest rate whatever. They will be sold by competitive bidding; and whatever interest the purchaser secures is the difference between the value of the certificate at maturity and the price he pays for it. That is substituted in place of the present short-time certificate issued for 3, 6, or 9 months or a year at an interest rate of 3 or 3½ or 4¼ per cent, or whatever the rate may be. It seems to me there is every advantage in substituting this form of financing the Government for the present form.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, I concede that that would be so for the Government's operations.

Mr. COUZENS. But it makes no difference in the volume.

Mr. SMOOT. They have to pay for the certificates.

Mr. GLASS. But a speculator can obtain these short-time certificates for use in the rediscount market with greater convenience and facility to himself than he could obtain United States bonds.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no, no; that is not the question, Mr. President. The Treasury officials are now issuing, as the Senator knows, certificates of indebtedness, and they are available to the speculator in every way.

Mr. GLASS. I know they are, and that is what I am complaining of.

Mr. COUZENS. These are no different.

Mr. GLASS. But here we are multiplying the facilities for that very sort of thing.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no; the Senator is all wrong in regard to multiplying the facilities.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, we ought to repeal the war-time provision—because it was put there under the pretense that it was a war necessity—of the Federal reserve act that enables these gamblers to use the credit of the United States Government for their purposes.

Mr. COUZENS. I have no objection if the Senator will propose that. That, however, is an entirely different proposition than the one we now have before us. If the Senator will introduce a bill proposing the repeal of the section of which he complains, I shall be very glad to support his efforts.

Mr. GLASS. I am going to do that.

Mr. COUZENS. This, however, has nothing whatever to do with that phase of the matter.

Mr. GLASS. I just can not see it that way. It looks to me like multiplying the facilities of these people to use the credit of the United States Government for stock speculative purposes.

The Senator knows perfectly well that when the Federal reserve act was passed we never should have included United States bonds as a basis of rediscount but for the fact that of the less than $1,000,000,000 of bonds outstanding the banks themselves owned $748,000,000 for circulation purposes. We never should have permitted United States securities to be used as a basis for rediscount but for that fact. Nobody ever dreamed that there would be billions upon billions of dollars of United States bonds outstanding; and these people have been enabled to engage in these excessive speculations—which, as I have said, have paralyzed legitimate business credits in this country—by reason of the fact that they use United States bonds for their 15-day loans; and now why will they not use these short-time United States notes for the same purpose?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Senator is absolutely right with respect to what he says about using Federal obligations for rediscounting purposes. I think the whole stock-market situation is as bad as the Senator can picture it. With everything he says I concur; and when men like Mr. Durant, who have made their great fortunes by speculative methods, come out and find fault with whatever measures the Federal reserve banks may take to suppress this orgy of speculation, it is perfectly obvious that they are doing it wholly for selfish reasons.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and Mr. Durant has lured more innocent amateur gamblers into the market than any other 40 individuals in the United States.

Mr. COUZENS. But the Senator overlooks the fact that that has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. GLASS. Well, I am trying to find out. This bill has just been presented. I am not a member of the Finance Committee, and I want to know.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. COUZENS. I am telling the Senator that this does not in any sense increase the volume of Government securities, and has absolutely no effect upon the volume that may be discounted by the owners of them.

Mr. GLASS. Could not a speculator more readily acquire, from day to day, these short-time securities for his rediscounting purposes than he could bonds?

Mr. COUZENS. He could do that more than he could with bonds; but we are not talking about bonds. We are talking about certificates of indebtedness versus these notes. These notes are not to take the place of bonds. These bills or notes, or whatever they may be called, are to take the place of certificates of indebtedness which have the same length of maturity that the present certificates of indebtedness have.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. As a matter of fact, this method of financing, if I understand it correctly, will actually reduce the volume of certificates of indebtedness under those now being issued. Under the present plan, as the Senator knows, from time to time the Treasury announces an issue of certificates of indebtedness perhaps drawing 4 per cent, or thereabouts, and they are taken up throughout the country. The Government authorities have discovered, since following that method of financing, that they sometimes get more money than they actually need to meet the obligation they are anticipating, so that they have suggested the plan which I understand is now in vogue in Great Britain and some other countries, of issuing as needed in the open market over the counter, and letting investors bid for just what they need. They will thus save money in interest, and they will have money in actual principal borrowing.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as I have indicated, I can very readily see that it is to the advantage of the Government to do that if it is not to be attended by what I have feared, and about which I am now asking, the use of these certificates more readily for stock-speculative purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, it is very easily explained.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COUZENS. Just a moment. I want to say to the Senator that I would be in entire sympathy with his position, but I agree with the Senator from New Jersey that in all probability, if this bill becomes a law, there will be less of these short-time securities on the market than there now are; and I want to say that I commend the department for making this suggestion.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. COPELAND addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I was simply going to say to the Senator that it can not be otherwise than that they will be less, because, as I said, the life of these securities on the average will not be over 45 days, and the Government is not going to issue them except as it wants the money. When certificates are issued, as the Senator knows, they are put out up here, and the Government has to say what the rate of interest shall be under these certificates that are issued. The Government names the rate, and it names it after figuring what the rates of money are in the United States from one end of the country to the other. These bills are to be issued drawing no interest, and a straight bid is to be made for them, just as the Senator from Michigan said. There is not any chance for speculation in them, and the Government can take them up at any time.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Michigan a moment ago spoke about the removal of the capital-gains tax. How are the legitimate industries of our country going to be carried on with a billion and a half of dollars taken out of the deposits in the New York banks to go into speculation, and billions more tied up because of the capital-gains tax, which prevents those who own those securities from redeeming them? Where is the money to come from to carry on industry?

I think myself it is a very serious thing. I think that many legitimate enterprises requiring capital are having great difficulty to-day about getting it. Where is it to come from?

Mr. COUZENS. What relation has that to capital gains?

Mr. COPELAND. The question is, Will there not be an appeal made pretty soon?

Mr. COUZENS. An appeal for what?

Mr. COPELAND. To do away with the tax on capital gains.

Mr. COUZENS. Why, it is being made now. It is promoted by the Senator's colleagues in Wall Street every hour of the day. They are now campaigning and have already started propaganda to repeal the capital-gains tax because of the enormous amount of money that has been made in speculation on the New York Stock Exchange.

Mr. COPELAND. How does the Senator expect to carry on these legitimate enterprises? Where is the money to come from?

Mr. COUZENS. It all depends upon the Senator's interpretation of a "legitimate enterprise." My view is that all of this gambling on the New York Stock Exchange is not legitimate enterprise.

Mr. COPELAND. I am not talking about that at all. I am talking about manufacturing enterprises.

Mr. COUZENS. But what does the capital-gains tax have to do with securing capital for the manufacturing enterprises?

Mr. COPELAND. If your money is all tied up——

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, this is another question.

Mr. COPELAND. This is outside of the matter under discussion; but it is a good time to speak of it, perhaps. If your money is tied up, if a lot of it is going into speculation, if the banks are so short that they have no money to advance, with securities tied up by these rich men—not the men on Wall Street, but some of the other men—where is the money to come from to loan to these legitimate manufacturing enterprises?

Mr. COUZENS. I will ask the Senator another question. Where has the money come from during all these years since the Congress adopted a capital-gains tax? What is the difference now from the time when we adopted that tax years and years ago, and which has been constantly paid ever since? In other words, during the greatest expansion period of the country we have had a capital-gains tax. What is the situation now that makes it different than it has been all during the years of the past except the great demand by the gamblers in Wall Street to have the capital-gains tax repealed? That is the only difference.

Mr. COPELAND. Has the Senator any plan to suggest by which the money will not be used in that way in order that it may be used for its legitimate purposes?

Mr. COUZENS. I am very much in sympathy with the proposal of the Senator from Virginia to give the Federal reserve bank sufficient authority that they may check this orgy of gambling, and extracting from legitimate commerce the money that should be there in order to put it into the gambling market.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I desire to corroborate the statement made by the Senator from Virginia; and in a resolution which I offered some time ago I asked the Committee on Banking and Currency to consider the question of repealing the so-called war amendments to the Federal reserve act, because, as I contended, they have outlived their usefulness.

The Senator from Virginia has challenged attention to the fact that advantage has been taken of one of the war amendments to the Federal reserve act to facilitate the obtaining of credits which were used for stock gambling. I am sorry the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency is not here. I think the stock-gambling situation has become such a national evil, and some believe national scandal, as to call for an exhaustive investigation by the committee. On May 16 I offered a resolution for the purpose of having the committee make a comprehensive examination of all questions relating to the Federal reserve bank and all cognate questions, with a view to recommending such legislation as would tend to cure the evils complained of and remedy any infirmities in the Federal reserve act.

I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the resolution to which I have referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Resolution 71

Resolved, That in order to provide for the most effective operation of the Federal reserve system, to inform the Senate of the facts in connection with the use of the reserve funds of banks, in carrying or trading in securities, contrary to existing law, and to furnish a basis for constructive legislation to remedy such defects in our banking system as may be found to exist, the Committee on Banking and Currency, or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation and to report thereon to the Senate as soon as practicable, with such recommendations for necessary legislation as it deems advisable;

1. What defects, if any, have been found to exist in the operation of the Federal reserve system, and what legislation is necessary to correct such defects;

2. Whether the facilities of the Federal reserve banks have been utilized in loans for trading in and carrying securities;

3. Whether member banks have afforded unduly large accommodation to brokers;

4. Whether the banking laws of the United States should be amended so as to restrict the use of general bank credits for speculative purposes or to limit the volume of loans made for the purpose of carrying on marginal transactions in stocks and other transactions of a speculative character, either through the introduction of term settlements or otherwise;

5. The classification of loans to brokers by members of the Federal reserve system and the purposes for which such loans are used, particularly in connection with new issues;

6. The different types of trading on the stock exchanges and the scope of each, as well as the extent of so-called "short sales" and the relative degree of concentration in "pool" stocks;

7. The effect of the operations of the Federal reserve system in contributing to the high rate of interest on call money and to the drawing of money from rural districts to financial centers for speculative purposes;

8. The basis for the acceptance policies of the Federal reserve system and the extent to which mergers are taking place between member banks in the Federal reserve system;

9. Whether or not chain banking and branch banking are being developed and the effect and qualities of these types of banking;

10. The extent to which investment or security trusts are being formed by or in connection with member banks of the Federal reserve system, and the extent, character, and effect of their operations;

11. The extent of the loans to such trusts by the member banks and the loans made by them, at call and otherwise, the dividends paid by such trusts, and the effect of such trusts upon fluctuations in the market value of stocks;

12. Whether or not the usury laws are evaded by such investment or security trusts;

13. Whether the member banks of the Federal reserve system should be prohibited from forming or being concerned with investment or security trusts;

14. The extent of the power of Congress to regulate the business of stockholders and others engaged in issuing, negotiating, or trading in securities;

15. Whether the effect of the direct discounting of member-bank notes by reserve banks has proven harmful;

16. Whether the so-called "war amendments" to the Federal reserve act have not outlived their object;

17. The number of bank failures within the period of 10 years prior to the passage of this resolution and the causes of such failures;

18. Whether the national banking laws should be amended so as to prevent Federal charters being granted to associations having less than $100,000 capital;

19. Whether the merger or consolidation of large financial institutions is beneficial or whether such mergers or consolidations should be restricted;

20. The extent of the powers of Congress to legislate with respect to mergers and consolidations of financial institutions brought about under State law with which the members of the Federal reserve system are not concerned; and

21. Whether there is any evidence of concerted action on the part of member banks of the Federal reserve system to discriminate between competing business concerns in the extension of credits and the making of loans.

For the purpose of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Seventy-first and succeeding Congresses until the final report is submitted, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per 100 words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $25,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I simply wanted to assure the Senator—as far as one Senator, a member of the committee, can give assurance—that I am positive the Committee on Banking and Currency fully recognize the situation and its serious aspects, as well as the great difficulty in finding a solution. I am familiar with the fact that a resolution introduced by the Senator from Utah, and I believe another resolution on the same subject offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], are before us at this time. I am quite positive that the Senator can feel assured that the Committee on Banking and Currency will give every consideration to those resolutions, I repeat, recognizing the great difficulty of the situation.

I am sure the Senator will agree with me that credit is one of the most delicate bits of mechanism, if I may use that illustration, it is possible for a legislative body to confront. I do not think such a problem can be helped through debate, unless there is some proposal actually before the Senate dealing with existing law. We well know there are two schools of thought very clearly defined in the matter of credit, those who believe in higher rediscount rates, and those who believe in lower rediscount rates. I also believe expanding brokers' loans are unfortunate. The problem, however, is, to some extent, partially solved when the market has undergone such a "break," so called, as it has undergone in the last week or so.

Such conditions, of course, greatly influence the credit situation, and I know the Senator, who views all these things broadly, undoubtedly will agree that this subject is one which should be first considered by the committee. The Senator from Virginia is a very active member of the committee, and I hope in due time a report will be made to the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. COUZENS. May I ask the Senator from New Jersey, first, whether the committee has taken up this subject for consideration?

Mr. EDGE. Not since the resolution was introduced, as I recall. We have had informal discussions in the committee at times, but not since the resolution was introduced. I am, of course, only making my own inferences, as the Senator from Idaho stated this morning as to a resolution before the Committee on Foreign Relations; I think the general feeling and disposition on the part of the committee has been, that in this special session, beyond possibly reviewing the matter, there could be no action, and I was under the impression that the Senator from Utah had publicly stated that he did not really expect action until the regular session of Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me now?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. What I stated, in answer to a question propounded by one of the able reporters of the press gallery, was that I did not expect any legislation at this session, but I did hope—indeed, expected—that the Committee on Banking and Currency would consider the subject and appoint a subcommittee for the purpose of making the investigation called for. I sincerely hope that before a recess is ordered the committee will convene and take up my resolution and other measures pending and appoint a subcommittee to carry on the requisite investigation during the summer.

Let me say, in conclusion—and I apologize to the Senator from Michigan for trespassing upon his time—I am sure the Senator from New Jersey must agree with me that the Federal reserve system was established primarily for the purpose of supplying credits to those engaged in industry and commerce and not to furnish credits for stock gambling, either directly or indirectly, and that it has been so perverted and its facilities have been availed of by speculators and stock gamblers. In this respect the Federal reserve system has failed to meet its responsibility.

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator will submit to an interruption, the suggestion having been made to me by the Senator from Utah——

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I am not prepared to admit that the Federal Reserve Board have in any way, shape, form, or manner violated or misinterpreted the law under which they are operating. As to their judgment on various occasions when called upon to make decisions, of course, that is a matter on which any Senator or any citizen has a perfect right to disagree. As to overspeculation, I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Utah, but I am not prepared, I repeat, to hold the Federal Reserve Board accountable for that.

Of course, after all is said and done, while we may be able, through legislation, somewhat to discourage what is generally termed gambling speculation through some form of taxation or some form of additional payments on stock transfers, it is nevertheless impossible for Congress to tell an individual how or where he shall spend his own money. In this great progressive Nation of ours, of which we are all very proud, citizens are active, and always will be active, in different forms of speculation. They may trade horses, they may buy stocks, they may buy bonds, they may deal in real estate, but they will speculate, and we are at least glad they are progressive.

I repeat, credit is one of the most delicate problems that could ever come before a congressional body, and I think it is a subject which the committee should first consider. I am prepared, as a member of the committee, to give to it that consideration which I trust and I am sure would result in calmly considered, deliberately considered measures for relief, if such measures are possible through legislation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of calling a quorum?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield for that purpose?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. REED. I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen	Glass	McNary	Smoot
Ashurst	Glenn	Metcalf	Steck
Blease	Greene	Moses	Steiwer
Borah	Hale	Norbeck	Stephens
Bratton	Harris	Norris	Swanson
Brookhart	Hastings	Nye	Thomas, Idaho
Broussard	Hatfield	Oddie	Thomas, Okla.
Burton	Hawes	Overman	Townsend
Capper	Hayden	Patterson	Trammell
Connally	Heflin	Phipps	Tydings
Copeland	Howell	Pine	Tyson
Couzens	Johnson	Pittman	Vandenberg
Cutting	Jones	Ransdell	Wagner
Deneen	Kean	Reed	Walcott
Dill	Kendrick	Sackett	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Keyes	Schall	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	King	Sheppard	Warren
Frazier	La Follette	Shortridge	Waterman
George	McKellar	Simmons	Watson
Gillett	McMaster	Smith	Wheeler

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that there has been some diversion in the discussion of the bill, though still dealing with finance, I want to say, in commenting on what the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] said, that there is, indeed, violent disagreement as to the conduct of the Federal Reserve Board. In my judgment, they have been what would perhaps be called in vulgar language rather "dumb" in not dealing with a situation such as the present one, which ought to have been dealt with months and months ago. In other words, had they been alert and on the job there is no question in my mind that this great orgy of speculation and consequent penalty upon legitimate industry would not have occurred.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to complete my statement first. We all heard during the discussion of the tax bill, and especially the discussion with reference to surtaxes, that the Government must reduce surtaxes to a minimum so as to release as much money as possible for legitimate industry. Now we are in another situation where money needs to be released for legitimate industry, and I do not hear the advocates who were then advocating a reduction in surtaxes so as to release money for legitimate industry suggesting the same argument or any similar argument now that money should be released from the gambling mart for the benefit of legitimate industry. It is strange how silent they are. Those advocates were then desirous of releasing all the money possible for industry but they are now silent when these great billions of dollars have come into the gambling mart. They objected vigorously to going into the pockets of the Government to pay off its great national debt, but they seem, as I said, strangely silent now and are not commenting now on the great volumes of money that have been taken from legitimate industry and put into the gambling mart.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I do not like to interrupt him, but the Senator has referred to my statement, so that I feel he would be willing to have me ask him one question, at any rate.

Mr. COUZENS. Very well.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator has emphasized his disagreement with the policy of the Federal Reserve Board in connection with present overspeculation. What would the Senator propose or suggest that the Federal Reserve Board should have done to have stopped citizens throughout the United States from buying stocks?

Mr. COUZENS. That is not a pertinent question to the discussion because it implies, as propounded by the Senator from New Jersey, that citizens of the United States were buying stocks. My interpretation is perhaps different from that of the Senator from New Jersey. The Senator from New Jersey says "buying" stocks. I do not consider gambling in stocks as "buying" stocks. I have an entirely different understanding of the legitimate buying of stocks as differentiated from gambling in stocks.

Mr. EDGE. I will agree entirely with the Senator's interpretation in order to have my question answered, and I will use the expression "speculating or gambling in stocks." What would the Senator propose the Federal Reserve Board should have done to have kept citizens from spending their own money in gambling in stocks?

Mr. COUZENS. I object again to the Senator's question. The Senator is so smart that he develops a question which is impossible to answer without some explanation. He said "using their own money." He always inserts something in his questions which makes it impossible to answer. They are not gambling with their own money. They are not buying stocks with their own money. When the question is asked in the form in which the Senator has asked it, he knows he is not asking the kind of question that can be answered.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. McMASTER. As a partial answer to the Senator from New Jersey I will say that it is reported that one of the large banks located in the Central West, one of the largest banks in fact, borrowed $70,000,000 from the Federal reserve bank and immediately reloaned it to the brokers in New York. I wish to say that it is wholly within the province of the Federal Reserve Board to inspect the character of the loans of those banks who are taking money from the Federal reserve banks and if they are loaning it out for speculation the Federal Reserve Board have it wholly within their power to take some steps to stop it at least to that extent.

Mr. COUZENS. There is no question but what the Federal Reserve Board could have controlled the situation if they had had initiative. There are many ways in which they could have done it. If they had attempted to do something early in the inception of the orgy of gambling, they could have raised the discount rate and checked the whole thing. It is very easy for anyone who is not a member of the board or of any board or even a Member of Congress to criticize somebody else. I am not attempting to criticize any acts of the Federal Reserve Board. I do not know what their arguments were when they refused to raise the rediscount rate early in this orgy of gambling, but I do say that they certainly had information early enough in the situation to have done something to have prevented it from getting as far as it did and to have kept it from attaining its present colossal rise.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. May I refer to the suggestion made by the Senator from South Dakota and then I will promise the Senator from Michigan to take no more of his time? This is a question that could be debated very interestingly for hours, but I do not want to take the Senator's time.

I have heard it frequently suggested that it was possible for reviewing bodies such as the Federal Reserve Board and others to earmark loans. Perhaps it is to a certain extent, but I contend that anyone who suggests that any bank in the country, in the West or in the East or in any other section, can to any considerable degree control the use of the money they loan on proper security and refuse to loan it when they suspicion that it is to be used for speculation is putting a pretty difficult and involved question up to the control of the board.

On one point the Senator suggested, without enlarging upon it, I think I am in agreement with him. I feel that the big menace in the situation to-day, which seems, however, to be improving because of the smash, is the large interest rates that have been paid on call loans in New York. If the Senator criticizes that I am in agreement with him. I think there should be some way to get at that matter so there would not be the temptation to send money from the West or any other section of the country. In my judgment, a 20 per cent call money rate can not be successfully defended. It is something to which the Banking and Currency Committee, in my judgment, can well afford to give careful attention and consideration. There may be a method of placing such profits in a class in the income-tax returns by itself to require larger tax payments. Or some other method in the nature of usury laws might be effective. I am not offhand prepared to say.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. McMASTER. In reference to the Federal reserve bank having it within its power to curtail loans along certain lines or to certain types of industry, the Senator well remembers that in 1920 the Federal Reserve Board in Washington ordered an agricultural deflation, and anyone who followed the loans then that were made to the banks in the agricultural sections of the West knows that the order was effective and that the agricultural loans were curtailed by many hundreds of millions of dollars. That brought about the agricultural deflation and that came through a definite order of the Federal Reserve Board in Washington.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator in that connection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Banking and Currency Committee had before it at the last session a resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in connection with brokerage loans and we did go quite extensively into an examination of that question. We had before the committee members of the Federal Reserve Board and made an examination into some of the methods affecting this obnoxious and intolerable situation. We finally reached the conclusion, or some of the members of the committee at least did, to the effect that the Federal Reserve Board, if they did not have direct authority and power under the law to do this thing, indirectly and through their influence by being in touch with member banks of the entire system, could bring about a correction of that condition. That was rather assumed. I do not know that they said they could, but we finally left them under that impression, and I thought and still think that the Federal Reserve Board have within the scope of their influence, if not direct authority, the power to stop the bringing of money from different portions of the country and the banks sending their money to New York to be loaned on call at rates which went as high as 20 per cent. That is taking money from industry and using it for brokers' loans and gambling and speculation, which is a bad situation. I believe the Federal Reserve Board can stop that being done. It will be remembered that one banker in New York ignored the Federal Reserve Board's wishes in connection with the matter, but I think that was rather an exceptional case. I still think there is power in the board through their influence, if not directly authorized by law, to correct the situation.

Mr. EDGE. Have they not constantly admonished and is not that all the power they really have?

Mr. FLETCHER. Their admonition has had effect from time to time.

Mr. EDGE. I think it has.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator refers to admonitions. There has been such a little slap on the wrist along that line that it has only caused a momentary flurry. There is no doubt in the first instance if the conduct of the board was not carried on in secrecy, if there was not a constant rumor in Wall Street and everywhere else of what the Federal Reserve Board were going to do, what they were thinking about doing, what they said in closed session, that there would not have been half the difficulties that now exist. I am confident that had the Federal Reserve Board talked openly and frankly at the beginning of this orgy of speculation and had said, "If this situation does not slacken up, if the rates for call money continue to rise, if this diversion of money from legitimate industry to the gambling crowd does not stop, it will be the policy of the Federal Reserve Board to raise the discount rate to a material extent," the situation would have been very different.

Does the Senator from Indiana wish to interrupt me?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. I am sure that everybody agrees that the present situation is not a happy one for the country or a very fortunate one for large numbers of American citizens, and that everyone who thinks about such questions at all has been thinking about some way to escape from the present situation and some way in which we might prevent a recurrence of present conditions. However, of course, there is a wide divergence of opinion as to what the Federal Reserve Board might have done. I assume we all agree that the Federal Reserve Board does not fix the rate for call money in New York City. The rate is not fixed by the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, certainly not; neither was the deflation of the agricultural industry in 1920 fixed by the Federal Reserve Board, but that board had sufficient influence and power to accomplish the very end it desired; and if it had desired to do it in this case it could have done it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, there is much, I think, in what the Senator from Michigan says. Just how far the Reserve Board might have gone could be determined only empirically; that is, by actual experimentation. I do not think it is altogether true, as my friend from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] seems to have indicated, that money was sent to New York for speculative purposes by banks. The truth about the matter is that large numbers of individuals all over the United States sent their money there. Suppose the Senator from Michigan wished to send a million dollars to a broker in New York City for speculative purposes, how could that be prevented?

Mr. COUZENS. I know of no way in which it could be prevented.

Mr. WATSON. No. On the other hand, corporations are now loaning money in large sums.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; but I think every one of them violates its charter in doing so. I do not believe there is a single corporation in any State of which I know that has any right to engage in the money-loaning business under the authorization of its charter. Take the corporation charters in the State of Michigan, for example, they do not authorize corporations when they take out a manufacturing charter to engage in the money-loaning business.

Mr. WATSON. That is the very question I want to present to the Senator for his consideration.

Mr. COUZENS. I believe that nearly every corporation has violated the provisions of its charter when it has loaned money in Wall Street.

Mr. WATSON. If that could be definitely established, it would cut off a large source of the supply, because the corporations do lend vast sums of money in New York right now for that purpose, and they have been doing so.

Mr. COUZENS. I have not any doubt about it, and if I were the governor or the district attorney or the attorney general of a State I would prosecute upon adequate evidence—and I think it could be easily obtained—any corporation which had violated its charter by sending money into the Wall Street pool.

Mr. WATSON. The money so loaned, I assume, is in the shape of undistributed profits, although as to that I am not certain. I do not know what else they could employ in the call-money market; but as to just how far their authority goes to dispose of such undistributed profits in that way I am not prepared to say. At all events, however, it is a question that is worthy of consideration. It is not true, in my judgment, that the great volume of money that has gone to New York has gone there from banks in the West or elsewhere; but I think it has gone there from individuals and from corporations. As to how far that is subject to the control of the Federal reserve system is a question that is, at least, open to discussion.

Mr. COUZENS. I wish to say to the Senator from Indiana that, of course, there is a difficult situation confronting Congress in determining how far it should go in restricting activities of members of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. WATSON. That is quite true.

Mr. COUZENS. In other words, many national banks are deserting the Federal reserve system and taking out State charters because of the greater liberties allowed under State laws. The greater the restrictions we place on national banks—and that has reference to the possible restriction of loaning money on call in Wall Street—the greater will be the number, of course, of those banks which will withdraw from the Federal reserve system and operate under State laws, and other banks will not become members of the Federal reserve system. So it is not a simple matter to say how far we should go in limiting the authority either of national banks or of State banks that may be members of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. In regard to the suggestion made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] that the banks are not sending money to Wall Street——

Mr. WATSON. Oh, no; I said they were not sending it there in a large volume. I think the larger part of the money that has gone there has not gone from banks.

Mr. BROOKHART. Some months ago I made a survey of 12 of the banks in my State, and one of them included the second largest bank in the State. I found that the Iowa banks at that time on three different accounts had over $500,000,000 of bank money in Wall Street. Part of that was redeposits with New York banks, part of it consisted of long-time bonds on which they received 4¼ per cent, and a considerable portion was directly in the form of margin loans. From those 12 banks the estimate made by the bankers themselves showed that over $500,000,000, which was over half of all the deposits in all the banks of the State, was in Wall Street.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether the money that was redeposited in New York did not really belong in New York, and was not, therefore, Iowa money which had been sent to Wall Street? In addition to that, I should like to ask the Senator whether the banks in Iowa do not always keep deposits either in New York or in Chicago of somewhere near the sum he has mentioned, because they must have a surplus fund somewhere on which they can immediately draw on account of the demands which may be made upon them?

Mr. BROOKHART. I will say to the Senator that the theory of New York is that that money belongs in New York, although it was earned out in Iowa and deposited in Iowa banks. The Iowa banks get 2 per cent on their redeposits in New York—that is all they get for it—but they have no place else to send it where they can get even 2 per cent, and the Federal reserve law gives the New York banks that monopoly over Iowa money. On that theory, I presume, the money belongs to New York.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I should like to reply to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield further to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. COUZENS. How long is the Senator going to take to reply?

Mr. KEAN. Only a moment.

Mr. COUZENS. Very well; I yield.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to say to the Senator from Iowa that New York is the only place in the world where there is a call-money market. Such a market does not exist in London; it does not exist in Paris; it does not exist in Berlin. New York is the only place in the world where it does exist; and, therefore, when the call rate goes up in New York it attracts money, and a great many million dollars from all over the world flow into New York because it has a call-money market.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New Jersey if he believes that the call-money situation can be corrected by legislation?

Mr. KEAN. I do not.

Mr. COUZENS. I wish to say that I disagree with the Senator, for, so far as the members of the Federal reserve system are concerned, the call-money situation can by legislation be corrected.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. It can also be corrected as to the State banks by denying them the United States mails and the privileges of interstate commerce, and we certainly can remedy the situation as to the member banks of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, since we have been diverted I wish to say a few words in regard to the Federal reserve banks. There is not any doubt that by legislation and by administration of the Federal reserve system the situation which now exists in New York in connection with the gambling in stocks can be remedied. The whole theory of the organization of the Federal reserve system was that it should function as a protection to industry. The whole purpose of rediscounting, the whole purpose of making currency liquid was to take care of emergencies in the industries. For those reasons the Federal reserve system was organized. I contend that that object has been largely defeated by the failure of the system itself properly to recognize its responsibilities and duties. I contend that the present situation should never have been permitted to have reached its present proportions. I contend that it has cost industry, manufacturing, retail and other business, as well as farming, hundreds of millions of dollars that can not be possibly justified under any conception of the organization of the Federal reserve system. I believe that the Federal Reserve Board, knowing the purpose for which it was organized, could have prevented the present situation just as readily as it could have prevented any other situation that it was intended to prevent when it was organized.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I agree entirely with the position taken by the Senator from Michigan; and 18 months ago I introduced a resolution calling upon the Federal Reserve Board to exercise its power to curtail the credit which was being taken from the Federal reserve system and used for speculative purposes on the stock exchange. That resolution further provided that in case the board did not agree with the Senate that it had such power it should recommend to Congress what legislation was necessary in order to give it that power. If the friends of the speculative activities in New York had not prevented the adoption of that resolution, the responsibility would have been placed upon the board either to have corrected the evil or to have recommended to Congress legislation which would give the board the power to correct it.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator knows very well that the influences are so great that there is no legitimate effort being exercised anywhere by high authority to curb speculation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I agree with the Senator absolutely. There were Senators here on this floor who prevented that resolution from being adopted even after it was recommended by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. COUZENS. O Mr. President, I have not the slighest doubt about that—and I do not impute bad motives to anybody—because even the very wise Senator from Utah, the chairman of the Finance Committee, argued with me months ago that the orgy of gambling in New York and the high rate of call money would not affect the interest rates to industry. He said that the customers of the banks could go to the banks and get money at the same rate of interest for which they always had obtained it, regardless of the call-money market. I think the Senator has changed his mind because he knows now that money borrowed by legitimate industry is higher than it ought to be; that bills discounted are higher than they ought to be; that commercial paper is higher than it ought to be. And why? Because the free money of the country that ought to be subject to use by industry is now being used for gambling purposes in New York.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I understood the Senator to say that he thought the Federal reserve system was a great system and that it was capable of preventing all these things that are now occurring. I think it is a great system, and that it could prevent these things, but it has not done so.

In line with what the Senator has said, I hold two newspaper clippings in my hand, one saying that wheat is below a dollar a bushel and the other that cotton lost a dollar and a quarter a bale, and that these losses were brought about by the break in the price of wheat and cotton caused by speculation on the stock exchange. The evil effect of this speculation is being felt directly in the speculation in grain and cotton and other farm products.

Mr. COPELAND and Mr. EDGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from New York, who rose first.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Michigan has precipitated this discussion. A little while ago he said that there was increasing difficulty in getting money for commercial purposes, legitimate industrial purposes, except at a high rate. That is not the worst of it. It can not be had at all. There are a great many commercial institutions that are limiting their activities because they can not get the necessary money. I think nothing is more important than to find some solution of this problem, because you gentlemen across the aisle have problems to solve. You do not have to talk about my friends in Wall Street. You have problems to solve, because otherwise you are going to have increasing unemployment.

Mr. COUZENS. I disagree with the facts stated by the Senator. I think he is all off on his facts. There is no difficulty in legitimate industries getting money. They can get money; but the price they have to pay is exorbitant, because they are competing with the gamblers in New York.

Mr. COPELAND. The answer to that is that the institution which can afford to pay the high rate gets the money, while a more modest institution, not being able to afford that high rate, can not get it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. Referring to the general criticism that has been made of the Federal Reserve Board, I think it would be a wonderful tribunal, clothed with any possible power that Congress could delegate to a board, that could maintain an equilibrium in credit conditions that would prevent people from having losses. I should like to see the legislation suggested that could possibly bring that millennium about. Some reforms, no doubt, can be instituted; but let us be fair with the Federal Reserve Board. People's natures can not be changed through legislation; and people will speculate, and sometimes with their own money.

Mr. COUZENS. Let me say to the Senator that no one suggests that the Federal reserve bank or any other governmental agency can prevent fools from losing their money. No one even suggests it.

Mr. EDGE. It has been suggested various times in the debate to-day, if I interpreted the debate correctly.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no; I disagree. The Senator can put any construction that he chooses on the language I used; but he has asked a number of very smart questions that have been difficult to answer. Whether or not they were trick questions I should not like to say.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator would not accuse the Senator from New Jersey of indulging in trick questions?

Mr. COUZENS. Well, the Senator said they were gambling with their own money. That was a very nice thing to have gotten by with if it had gotten by; but the facts are that they are not gambling with their own money.

Mr. EDGE. Not entirely.

Mr. COUZENS. No. They are not gambling with more than a small part of their own money. They are gambling with the money that belongs to the Nation for legitimate industrial purposes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COUZENS. Just a minute. No one suggests that the Federal Reserve Board have the power to make profits or losses for individual users of the system. I do contend that they have adequate power, through the direction of policies granted them by Congress, to control the situation within legitimate bounds. I do not believe they should have the power to say who shall lose money or who shall make money. I do not believe they should have the power that some people believe they should have; but they have the power, by the direction of policies and constructive administration of the service, to control the currency problem of the United States. If not, however, we had better do it all in the Government rather than to establish private agencies to do it.

Mr. GLASS and Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and to whom?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I agree thoroughly with practically everything that the Senator from Michigan has said, and I hope in a few days to be able to address the Senate briefly on the subject of the Federal reserve administration.

The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is mistaken, as the Senator from Michigan insisted, in saying that legitimate enterprise can not get funds at any price.

Mr. COPELAND. No, Mr. President; that is not what I said.

Mr. GLASS. That is what the Senator said, as he will see if he will have the reporter read his notes.

Mr. COUZENS. I think the Senator from Virginia is inaccurate. I think the Senator from New York said that the price of money was so high that some industries could not afford to pay the price.

Mr. GLASS. That is what the Senator added afterwards; but he said, as the reporter's notes will show, that legitimate business could not get funds at any price. But, be that as it may——

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. COPELAND. I desire to say this, and it is what I thought I had said: That because of the withdrawal of funds from the banks it is now extremely difficult for the small industrial institutions to get money, because they can not compete with the larger and richer ones in paying the high prices that are demanded.

Mr. GLASS. That is a modification of what the Senator actually did say, and that is a statement of fact; but what I wanted to say was that any legitimate commercial or industrial enterprise in existing circumstnces, upon paper eligible for rediscount, can get accommodated at any Federal reserve bank, because the reserves of the 12 Federal reserve banks range from 72 to 80 per cent to-day, showing that they have ample facilities to make commercial and industrial loans. All that people have to do is to present eligible paper and get their credits; but what the Senator has last said is absolutely correct. The high money rates are such that not only are commercial enterprises and industrial business heavily taxed for their essential credits, but even States and communities have been obliged to defer necessary public improvements because they can not get accommodations at reasonable rates; and they can not get them because the gamblers have run away with the money market in New York.

While I am on my feet, let me say to the credit of the Federal Reserve Board—which is, as the Senate knows, an altruistic body; it has no interest whatsoever in banking or in credits—that it has vainly but persistently been trying for the last six months to establish a policy that the law itself makes mandatory upon the banks and the board, and that should have been established long ago, and, if established long ago, would have averted this difficulty.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator point out to me what efforts have been made in the last six months to accomplish that end?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I will. The New York bank, since the 14th of last February, has been pounding the Federal Reserve Board to increase the rediscount rate on commercial paper.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator yield there for a moment? I think the Senator and I are not in disagreement.

Mr. GLASS. Not at all.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator is talking about the Federal reserve bank; but I am talking about the policy of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. GLASS. I am talking about both, if the Senator will permit me. I say that the Federal Reserve Board, since the 14th of last February, has been pounded every week by the directors of the New York Federal Reserve Bank to permit that bank to penalize legitimate commercial transactions in this country by raising its rediscount rate. With perhaps a single exception, there has not been a meeting of the board of directors of the New York Federal Reserve Bank in that period which has not raised its rediscount rate, subject to sanction by the Federal Reserve Board; and there has not been a week that the Federal Reserve Board has not refused to sanction the raise.

Mr. COUZENS. Why?

Mr. GLASS. By every influence, legitimate and illegitimate, by threats and otherwise, that New York crowd has been trying to compel the Federal Reserve Board to raise its commercial rediscount rate; and it has refused by a very narrow margin within the board. As I pointed out publicly six or eight weeks ago, when an outstanding director of the New York Federal Reserve Bank—the president of the largest bank in the Western Hemisphere—defied the board, and publicly avowed that his obligation to the stock gamblers was superior to his obligation as a sworn officer of the Federal reserve system, what the board should have done was to have kicked that fellow out of his position before noon of the day upon which he made that announcement. Had it done that, it could have retrieved itself, and recovered somewhat of its lost prestige, and had it understood that under the law it was the supreme authority in Federal reserve banking. That is what should have been done.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator believe, in making the argument he has just made, that the Federal Reserve Board should have raised the rate, or kept the rate where it was?

Mr. GLASS. Why, I think it should have kept it where it was. That is what I think. I think the Federal Reserve Board deserves the greatest commendation for its refusal to be influenced by this stock-speculating crowd up there. What those people want is a recurrence of what happened 10 years ago. They have run away with the market. They have been permitted to use the trust credits of the Federal reserve system for stock-gambling purposes, which they should not have been permitted to do, and which the law inhibits their doing. They were permitted to do that; and now, to correct the situation that they themselves have precipitated, they want the commerce and industry of the country penalized by a raise in the rediscount rate. No; it should not be done, and the Federal Reserve Board at Washington deserves to be commended for resisting that powerful influence.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. Let me ask the Senator if at any period from the beginning of this orgy of gambling there was a time when the Federal Reserve Board could with propriety have raised the rediscount rate?

Mr. GLASS. I scarcely think so. Why, I will ask the Senator, should the commercial rediscount rate be raised? Only in the event that the demands upon the system are such that the reserves of the Federal reserve banks have been depleted to such a point as to make it dangerous to continue rediscounting at a given low rate.

Mr. COUZENS. Let me say to the Senator that I am in entire disagreement with his theory of the rates controlled by the Federal Reserve Board. Let me point out incidents that I know of, and I have not any doubt that they could be named by the thousand.

Not only do banks lend money to industry, we will say to a department store, to a manufacturer, to a grocer, to a dealer in any commodity, legitimate loans at 4½, 5, 6, or 6½ per cent, but then what do they do? When the call-money market gets high, they take that commercial paper and rediscount it at the Federal reserve bank, and use the money they get out of the Federal reserve bank to send to New York to get the outrageous call-money rate.

Mr. GLASS. Exactly; and what I am saying is——

Mr. COUZENS. Let me say, before the Senator gets on to the other point, that had the Federal reserve bank raised the rates before that orgy started, there would not have been the incentive for the banks of the country to send their money to New York at call-money rates.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; had the Federal reserve bank done what the law makes it mandatory for the Federal reserve bank and the Federal Reserve Board to do, had the Federal reserve bank said to its member banks, engaged in that sort of system, "You can not rediscount with us at any rate if you are going to use your funds for stock-gambling purposes," we never should have had a situation like this. But it was the failure of the Federal reserve bank, and the failure of the Federal Reserve Board, to adopt a policy made mandatory in explicit terms by the law itself that caused those banks to use their rediscount credit for stock-speculative purposes. And now the Federal Reserve Board is engaged in the very practice that should have obtained all along of warning member banks that they can not rediscount, not even their eligible paper, with the Federal reserve bank if they are going to persist in contributing to this orgy of stock gambling. That should have been the fixed policy of the board; that should have been its invariable policy; and when the greatest bank president in the country defied the board and avowed his superior obligation to the gamblers as over against his official obligation to the system he should have been incontinently kicked out of the system.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to make one statement before we get the continuity of the debate disturbed.

The Senator from Virginia, then, admits that this whole situation has been developed through the incompetency or the inadequacy or the impotency of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. GLASS. I freely admit that the Federal Reserve Board, had it administered the system as the law requires, could have averted this difficulty.

Mr. COUZENS. That is the statement the Senator from Michigan made at the beginning of these comments.

Mr. GLASS. I am not disagreeing with the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. And the only point I hesitate to be dogmatic on is at what period during this time certain specific acts of the board should have been taken.

Mr. GLASS. They should have been taken long ago.

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, it seems to me this colloquy illustrates better than anything else just how difficult this problem is to solve. Here is a demonstration of two sincere Senators in agreement to a great extent as to conditions, probably entirely so, absolutely differing as to the remedy. The Senator from Virginia very frankly stated that he believed the Federal Reserve Board should be complimented for maintaining the rediscount rate as they have done through these various months. The Senator from Michigan just as earnestly, no doubt, having reached his conclusions absolutely through his investigation, takes absolutely the opposite view.

Mr. COUZENS. O Mr. President, before the Senator——

Mr. EDGE. I do not want to misquote the Senator, but time after time during the colloquy in which I have engaged with him he has stated—I am sure I am correct in the assertion—that if the Federal Reserve Board had raised the rediscount rate a long time ago we would not have had the present condition. Is not that correct?

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator involves the matter by not going back to the beginning of the discussion. Perhaps the Senator from Virginia and I disagree on the immediate thing we believe necessary to be done. I pointed out at the beginning that the Federal Reserve Board had sufficient power to declare a policy which would have prevented this orgy in gambling and the diversion of money from legitimate industry to the gambling market. At that time I did not say that it was desirable to raise the rediscount rate, so that I have not contended—nor do I differ with the Senator from Virginia—that all during this period the Federal reserve banks should not have raised the rediscount rate. I contend that had the Federal Reserve Board openly announced what it intended to do there may never have been a time when it would have been necessary to raise the rediscount rate. What I do say—and perhaps this is wherein I differ from the Senator from Virginia—is that this situation having been permitted to arise at some time in the past six months or so, a more immediate correction could have been attained by a raise in the rediscount rate to prevent the banks doing the very thing which I have pointed out they are doing, namely, taking out of their folders industrial paper and rediscounting it for the purpose of using the proceeds in the gambling markets of New York.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I may say that had the Senator embarked upon a scheme of that sort there is no telling to what degree he would have penalized legitimate commerce in order to abate stock gambling, and I for one do not think that legitimate commerce ought to be penalized one stiver to prevent people from gambling in stocks. As a matter of fact, it is a seriously debatable question as to whether or not the existing rediscount rate of 5 per cent is a fair rate for commerce in time of profound peace, when the Federal reserve banks have reserves ranging from 70 to 80 per cent. That is what those people up there want. That is what they deliberately did in 1919 and 1920, I will say to the Senator.

We have been hearing for 10 years about the Federal Reserve Board deflating the country. As a matter of fact, the country was absolutely deflated then, before the Federal Reserve Board ever pretended to curtail the credits of a single bank in this country. In December, 1920, wheat had gone down 50 per cent, cotton had gone down from 43 cents and a shade to 11 cents. Corn and oats and everything else had shrunk correspondingly, beginning with the debacle in silk in Japan, while the newspapers, and the Senate itself by resolution, were calling upon the Attorney General to put the profiteers in jail. The country had gone on a strike. No merchant was stocking up. They were living from hand to mouth. In December, 1920, the country was prostrate, every product of the farm and everything else that was to be sold was down. The buyers were on strike. Not yet had the Federal reserve banks raised their rediscount rate one stiver.

Then what happened? After the country had been thus deflated and was prostrate, all except the stock gamblers, several Federal reserve banks were induced to raise their rediscount rate.

What happened? The whole odium of deflation was transferred from the New York stock gambler to the Federal reserve banking system, and the whole agricultural industry of this country was arrayed in hostility, and has since been arrayed in hostility, against the Federal reserve banking system, upon the supposition that the raise in rediscount rates deflated the country.

That is the crafty proposition now of these gamblers who have created this situation. They want the Federal Reserve Board at Washington to authorize a penalty upon legitimate commerce by a raise in the rediscount rate to transfer from themselves the odium and the exasperation of the public against them for this unconscionable and wicked riot in gambling. The only way to correct it is to put a tax upon the gamblers, and that I am going to suggest be done at this session of Congress.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, in connection with the statement of the Senator from Virginia, the thought occurs to me that governmental action was precipitated in the interest of industry because of the high surtaxes. It was said that money should not be taken out of legitimate industry to pay governmental debts. The press of the country seemed to be unanimous in that sentiment. Now, I do not see the press, nor do I see high Government officials, urging that money be taken out of the gambling pool for legitimate industry. In other words, there is no protest about the money of the country going to the gambling pool as there was when the money of the country was coming to the Federal Government to liquidate its national debts.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I may state to the Senator, on the contrary, that we not only do not see protests, but we saw the extraordinary and unprecedented spectacle of a high official of the Federal Government deprecating any criticism of this riot of stock gambling, and saying that it was not an unhealthy symptom.

Mr. COUZENS. Of course, the Senator knows that those people who talk that way have gained and continue to gain hundreds of millions of dollars as the result of this situation.

Mr. GLASS. The person who talked that way was the President of the United States, who literally jumped into the stock pit and said there was nothing to be apprehended from this riot of six billions of dollars of credits in stock gambling.

Mr. COUZENS. I mentioned no particular individual. I said those who generally proposed leaving this gambling situation alone are the ones who are gaining as a result of it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I will put into the RECORD in a few moments, with the permission of the Senate, a statement appearing in the New York Times made by ex-President Coolidge a short time before the statement referred to by the Senator from Virginia was made, in which he referred to the unprecedented—up to that time—volume of loans to brokers and stock dealers by the New York Federal reserve member banks. These loans held by the New York banks, January 9, 1929, the date of the statement referred to, amounted to nearly $4,000,000,000, and the then President said that he saw nothing unfavorable in the situation.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, I stated a few moments ago that I desired to offer as a part of my remarks a statement by Mr. Coolidge appearing in the New York Times, in which he commented upon the credits extended by the New York banks to brokers. I ask that the entire statement may be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, January 7, 1929]

WASHINGTON, January 6 (A. P.).—Although loans to brokers and dealers held by New York Federal reserve member banks have reached the unprecedented height of $3,810,023,000, President Coolidge does not see any reason for unfavorable comment.

The loans are larger than at any time within the history of the Federal reserve system, and are about a billion dollars in excess of those reported on January 5, 1927. During the last month they increased by about $100,000,000, and except for a few minor fluctuations they have increased steadily for the last 18 months.

The President, it was said at the White House to-day, believes that the increase represents a natural expansion of business in the securities market and sees nothing unfavorable in it.

While feeling that this increase in brokers' loans is only natural, the President was represented as not attempting to qualify as an expert on the Federal reserve system. In a general way, however, he believes the growth of securities in recent years and of bank deposits would result naturally in greater brokerage business, with the resultant expansion in brokers' loans.

The President, it was explained, does not feel that he is in a position to say whether the loans have reached the stage of disproportion with the resources of the country.

The reports that President Coolidge saw no danger in the mounting total of brokers' loans, received after the close of the stock market, attracted interest in Wall Street. The brokers' loans in recent weeks have figured largely in discussions as successive new high records were established.

Two compilations of the loans are made, a weekly statement by the Federal Reserve Board and a monthly summary by the stock exchange. The latest statement by the Federal reserve authorities issued on Thursday placed the collateral loans to brokers by the Federal reserve member banks in New York City at $3,810,023,000, the highest ever reported, and an increase of $92,401,000 for the week. The present total represents an increase of $466,246,000 since October, when the present expansion began; and an increase of $991,462,000 since the beginning of 1927. The Federal reserve's report came out the day after the stock exchange had announced an increase of more than $341,000,000 for December in its compilation of brokers' loans, resulting in a total of $4,432,907,321, the largest on record.

The two sets of figures usually move in the same direction, but they are not identical since many stock exchange brokers get loans from institutions which are not members of the reserve system, and reserve member banks make loans to brokers who are not members of the exchange.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I interject there——

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I have not sought in this, as I never have in my whole public career, to give any partisan purpose to a problem of this kind. I do not care whether it was President Coolidge or President Somebody Else, whether he was a Republican or whether he was a Democrat. I deal with the matter as an economic proposition which affects the business of the country, every man, woman, and child in the country, and not as a partisan proposition.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator does not charge me——

Mr. GLASS. What I rose a while ago to say I did not say; that is, that if the Senator should once embark on the policy of penalizing legitimate commerce by a raise in the rediscount rate in order to put a stop to stock gambling, there would be no end to it. If the rate should be raised from 5 to 6 per cent, that would not do it. What does 6 per cent mean to a stock gambler who expects to make 50 per cent upon his venture? Then the rate would be made 7 per cent, and then 8, and 10, and so on progressively penalizing commerce in order to put a stop to stock gambling which never should have been permitted at all, and which the Federal reserve act in terms literally prohibits.

Mr. COUZENS. Before the Senator sits down may I say I do not assume he is charging me with being partisan?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no, no! I just did not want the Senator to think that I was.

Mr. COUZENS. I have been criticized for not being partisan.

Mr. GLASS. I do not charge that, and I do not entertain that thought.

Mr. COUZENS. Now we come back to the business before the Senate. On page 3 of the bill subsection (b) reads:

All certificates of indebtedness and Treasury bills issued hereunder (after the date upon which this subdivision becomes law) shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, and any gain from the sale or other disposition thereof shall be exempt from all taxation.

In line 3, page 4, I move to strike out the words "and any gain from the sale or other disposition thereof shall be exempt from all taxation." I offer that as an amendment to the bill.

I want to say in this connection that to the other features of the bill I have no objection and I believe that the passage of the bill with that exception will save much money to the Government in its refinancing operation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have the clerk state the amendment?

Mr. COUZENS. I will restate it for the Senator. If the Senator will look at page 3 of the bill, in line 4, he will see there the words which I have moved to strike from the bill, as follows:

and any gain from the sale or the disposition thereof shall be exempt from all taxation.

If those words are stricken from the bill, so far as I am concerned, the bill is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair call the Senator's attention to the fact that the words "from all taxation" in line 5 applied to the words preceding those which the Senator desires to strike out?

Mr. COUZENS. The present bonds are all tax exempt. There are other bonds that have been issued that are tax exempt in limited amounts. As respects those matters I do not particularly object to them being tax exempt so far as anything is concerned except the capital gain. In other words, I have no objection to the Federal bonds being exempt from taxation to the same extent that State and municipal bonds are exempt. I will support any other amendment that anybody else chooses to offer in that connection, but I believe that Federal bonds should be on the same basis as State and municipal bonds. I confess to the fact that the Chair is right, that this is a diversion from the usual principle of taxing these bonds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Treasury Department is very anxious that those words remain in the bill. That part of the bill is one which was perhaps most discussed before the committee. The committee as a whole, with the exception of the Senator from Michigan, thought that it was the proper thing to leave those words in the bill. Instead of costing the Government any money it will, in my opinion, save the Government thousands and tens of thousands of dollars. However, I want the Senate to express its opinion and I have no objection to a vote upon the item, if the Senators wants the yeas and nays.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to make one exception to what the Senator from Utah just said. The Senator said the Treasury Department was exceedingly anxious to have that language retained in the bill. Mr. Ogden Mills did not strenuously urge that the language be retained in the bill because it was pointed out that bills of acceptance and other financial transactions in the market do have to pay a capital-gain tax and it was pointed out there was no more intricacy involved in these cases than in this case. There is no urgency on the part of the Treasury Department, so far as it was represented by Mr. Mills before the committee, that the specific language be retained in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question in my mind but what the administration of the collection of the tax is just as simple on this as on any other bond or certificate issued by the Government of the United States. That question is not involved. The only question for the Senate to decide is whether it would be money in the pockets of the Government to sell these bills with an average life of not to exceed 45 days tax exempt from the gains that may be made upon them, or whether it shall sell them and then let the profits that are made upon them be exempt from taxation. That is all there is to it. It is only a matter of opinion. I hope the Senate will take a yea-and-nay vote on it.

Mr. COUZENS. Of course, the Senator is only making an assumption when he says 45 days.

Mr. SMOOT. I used what I believe to be the average.

Mr. COUZENS. That is not the question. It may be a much longer period than 45 days.

Mr. SMOOT. It could not be unless we increased the amount of our obligations. If the Government of the United States got into a position whereby we had to increase our obligations over what they are to-day, then I could not say that; but we know that as long as there is a decrease every year in the outstanding obligations of the Government, the certificates will be less each year and the life of them would be only between the sale date and the end of the three months. I took the average. It may be 50 days, or it may be 60 days, or it may be 40 days.

Mr. COUZENS. Does not the Senator agree that there is now an effort under way to have Congress repeal all of the capital-gain tax?

Mr. SMOOT. That has been true ever since we passed the first bill imposing a tax upon capital gains. The Senator is right, but there is no inclination on the part of the Finance Committee of the Senate or the Ways and Means Committee of the House to do such a thing. There is propaganda to have us do so and I am perfectly aware of it, and it will be kept up as long as anyone is compelled to pay that tax; but, in my opinion, the day will not come when Congress will act favorably on any such propaganda.

Mr. COUZENS. Is it not true that the Treasury Department on several occasions recommended the repeal of the capital-gains tax?

Mr. SMOOT. I think there were two occasions in our hearings when the question arose, and there was an expression on the part of some of the members of the Treasury Department to the effect that if that were done the Government of the United States would lose no money.

Mr. COUZENS. If that entering wedge is permitted to become effective to exempt any form of security from capital-gains tax, every Senator knows that it will be used as an argument by every agency that desires a repeal of the capital-gain tax.

Mr. SMOOT. It would have no effect whatever on anybody who knew the workings in the department. These bills are not to draw interest. They are to be bought outright. If anyone did buy these bills at 99⅞, we will say, and sold them at 100, there would be that profit of one-eighth. Whether they can do it or not depends entirely upon the money market. I think it is unnecessary, but I am not going to make any special fight over it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. REED. I think we ought to bear in mind that at the present time all of these certificates of indebtedness and Liberty bonds are absolutely tax free in the hands of the corporations——

Mr. COUZENS. Not as to capital gain.

Mr. REED. Wait a minute. The interest on certificates of indebtedness, on Treasury notes, and on Liberty bonds is absolutely tax free when they are held by a corporation.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. REED. If the Treasury wants to issue $100,000 of 4 per cent certificates with coupons attached for the payment of the interest, no bank or corporation that holds those notes—and most of them are held by corporations—is subject to one penny of tax thereon. The Treasury bills are intended to take the place of short-term Treasury certificates. In order to prevent the necessity of selling them at a flat price fixed in advance by the Treasury, or somewhat under the market in order to make sure they will sell, the Treasury has invented this idea of Treasury bills, somewhat similar to those now used in Great Britain by the Exchequer, in which they sell non-interest-bearing bills at a discount, exactly the same as a bank discounts a 30-day note which is payable at the end of 30 days without any interest. There is an apparent capital gain when a bank buys a 30-day note at a discount, but actually that capital gain represents the hire of the money for the interval that elapses between the purchase and the maturity date.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator has made two statements——

Mr. REED. I have made more than that.

Mr. COUZENS. I know he has made many more than that, but he has made two statements which I am afraid are misleading. In the first place, he said that certificates of indebtedness and Federal bonds held by corporations and banks are nontaxable.

Mr. REED. The interest on them is nontaxable. That is correct.

Mr. COUZENS. We are not discussing interest. We are discussing capital gain. The inference goes out that the bonds are not taxable in the hands of corporations. I contend that if there is a capital gain, they are taxable in the hands of a corporation.

Mr. REED. Precisely; and there the Senator puts his finger on the difference. If there is a capital gain in a transaction involving a 4¼ per cent Liberty bond, that is a true capital gain, and it is not interest. The coupon represents the interest on that investment. These certificates are to have no coupons, and ordinarily the capital gain in the five or six weeks that they would be held would represent the interest. It is the hire for the use of the money.

Mr. COUZENS. Before the Senator proceeds farther, I want to correct him in one respect. The Senator creates the impression that there can be no capital gain because it is all interest. If I buy one of those bills due September 1, 1929, and I buy it at 98 and sell it to-morrow at 99, there is a capital gain not represented by the interest to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. REED. Of course there is.

Mr. COUZENS. I say the statement is misleading because it is not all interest. It depends upon the time that elapses between the issuance of the security and the date of maturity.

Mr. REED. If the Senator wants to imagine such an extravagant illustration as that a Treasury bill will appreciate 1 point in the course of a day or a week even, of course in such an illustration there is a capital gain in excess of the amount of the interest paid for the use of the money. But if the Senator will bear with me for a moment, I want to show what the effect of the amendment would be.

This would be the practical effect of the amendment: I personally do not care a rap whether the tax-exempt feature remains in the bill or not; but if we are going to make interest on Treasury certificates tax exempt—and that is what we have done, because no corporation pays a penny of tax on certificate coupons—then there is no sense in providing for Treasury bills at all. If a corporation knows that it is going to have to pay a tax on the amount of the discount at which it purchases the Treasury bills under par—whether we regard it as a capital gain, as my friend from Michigan does, or whether we regard it as the hire of the money, as I do, does not make a particle of difference—no bank is going to buy Treasury bills on the same interest basis on which it will buy Treasury certificates, because one is free from tax and the other is subject to 11 per cent tax on all that gain. So there would be no use of initiating the system of Treasury bills if we are going to tax the fractional appreciation in the value. Banks will not buy them or else they will buy them at a discount, which is that much greater, so as to take care of the tax. We are just beating the devil around the bush if we try to make that fraction taxable, because we have to pay it to the bank, and then we go and tax the bank and get it back to ourselves. We had better get the advantage of the lower discount rate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I wish to answer the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. He is a very plausible debater, and what he says is substantially correct, except that to eliminate this provision would not defeat the purposes of the Treasury Department. All of the advantages that the Treasury Department would get under this proposed law will still be retained, even with the amendment which I propose, except a possible slight difference in the interest rate because of the fact that the banks may have to pay on the capital gain; but that is all problematical. The Undersecretary of the Treasury stated before the Finance Committee that the same identical bills of indebtedness, when traded in commerce, are subject to a profit tax. When a bill is traded in commerce, an acceptance, or what not, if there is a capital gain, it is taxed. There is no difference whatever. Whether or not we take the money out of one pocket and put it into the other, the fact is that if we shall adopt the principle of exempting securities from the capital-gain tax we shall establish a principle which will return to plague us so long as we have the capital-gain tax on the statute books.

Mr. REED. Is there not this distinction: When we tax a bank on the amount it receives in discounting John Smith's 30-day note we are getting the money either from the borrower or the lender; the Government does not pay out the money and immediately get it back, but in this case the Government is the borrower, the maker of the note, and, therefore, I do not see any sense in paying out extra interest and immediately taking back the same money in additional taxes?

Mr. COUZENS. In that event why should we not make all of the Government securities exempt from the capital-gain taxation? In other words, if the Government is selling certificates of indebtedness or Federal bonds on which there are no taxes on capital gains, unquestionably we could get a better price for them.

Mr. REED. If I had my way, there would not be any tax-exempt bonds at all. The Senator from Michigan asked me that question; but that is not practicable now, because we have put that law into effect and can not repeal it without breach of faith. However, so long as we have a great mass of $17,000,000,000 of outstanding securities, the interest on which is tax exempt, in the hands of corporations, and if we desire the securities to be issued under this bill to compete with the others and sell on the same interest basis, we have got to give them the same privilege.

Mr. COUZENS. If the Senator is correct, there is not any reason why we can not repeal the law which makes the income on other Federal securities taxable.

Mr. REED. The Senator does not mean that we can tax Liberty 3½ per cent bonds, for example?

Mr. COUZENS. No; I am saying just the reverse. I am saying that there is nothing in the world to prevent Congress from repealing the law which makes other Federal bonds taxable; I do not mean the tax-exempt bonds, but those that are taxable.

Mr. REED. Yes; there is. If we issued all our Liberty bonds and Treasury notes and Treasury certificates——

Mr. COUZENS. And they are all taxable.

Mr. REED. With the stipulation that they shall be wholly exempt from the normal tax.

Mr. COUZENS. I am not talking about the normal tax.

Mr. REED. The normal tax is all a corporation pays.

Mr. COUZENS. I am talking about capital gains. If it is desired to exempt these securities from the capital-gain tax, why not exempt all other Federal securities from the capital-gain tax?

Mr. REED. Because what the Senator calls capital gain here is really the hire of money; and that is not true of the others; they carry coupons.

Mr. COUZENS. But the principle is exactly the same. If there was not an advantage in having the capital-gain tax provision not apply to these securities, it certainly would not be included in the bill. The Senator from Pennsylvania shakes his head, but why does he want this provision in the bill if there is not some advantage to the Government from it?

Mr. REED. The advantage to the Government is obvious. It is going to have to pay 11 per cent more interest in the way of discount on these bills unless it makes them tax exempt.

Mr. COUZENS. So, for the purpose of getting this saving immediately to the Government, the Senator would adopt the principle of waiving the tax on capital gains?

Mr. REED. Not at all; I am not in favor of waiving the tax on capital gains. In the present condition of affairs it can not fairly be done. I did think a few years ago that the Government would save a great deal of money if it would disregard capital gains and losses, because there were always more losses reported than there were gains. That has not been so since 1924, and I join with the Senator in opposing the repeal of the capital-gains tax now, although I do think that, as it stands, it is a very clumsily arranged tax; it can be improved; but I agree with the Senator that the principle of taxing capital gains must be maintained for many years yet to come.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I can not believe that the clause in question in this bill relates to such a condition as that suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania. Of course, if the Treasury discounts its bills the same as the private individual discounts his bills at a bank, the difference between the amount that he pays for the bill and the par value of it is unquestionably the interest which comes to him. I apprehend that no one wants to subject that interest—that is to say, that difference—to taxation; but here is a man who buys one of these bills in a tight market, occasioned, perhaps, by the draining of available funds into the gambling market of which we have been speaking, so that the Government is obliged to sell at a rather high discount. After a time, however, the situation eases and that man sells his bill to some one else and makes a gain on it. I take it that the provision of the bill which the Senator from Michigan seeks to excise refers to gains made by him upon the sale of that bill.

Mr. REED. That is what the Senator has been speaking of.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just as one who bought stock at a certain figure and subsequently sold it at an appreciation would be obliged to include in his income-tax return whatever he made by the sale of the stock, why should he not be obliged to return what he made by speculating in the Government's bills, just as he would by speculating or investing in any other bills?

Mr. REED. If the Senator will look at the opposite page of the bill he will see that the new matter which it contains is the provision in line 6, on page 2, which provides that Treasury bills may be issued on a discount basis.

Mr. SMOOT. Without interest.

Mr. REED. It is to prevent that discount being taxable that the words were inserted on page 3 which the Senator from Michigan is now trying to strike out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think they are nontaxable for that reason at all. They are nontaxable, it seems to me, by reason of the further provision which forbids the taxing of the interest, because, as I have indicated, in my judgment, the difference between the sale price and the par value of the bill is not a gain from the sale at all but is the actual interest upon the money which is turned into the Treasury.

Mr. REED and Mr. COUZENS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just a moment. Is it not always the case with a bill which is discounted at a bank that the difference between the amount realized by the maker of the bill and the face of the bill is what he pays in interest?

Mr. REED. Yes; and that is what I have been arguing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. REED. And it is to make that difference nontaxable that these words were put in.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is nontaxable by reason of the provision of the bill that—

> All certificates of indebtedness and Treasury bills issued hereunder * * * shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest.

That is the whole thing—the principal is exempt. If a man buys at a discount of 4 per cent, he pays 96 for every $100 of face value; he pays $96, which is his principal, and the difference between that and $100 is his interest. He does not pay upon the $96 and he does not pay upon the $4 if he gets it; but if in the meantime he sells the bill to some one at 99, having paid only 96, then he makes a profit of 3 per cent; and why should he not be taxed on it?

Mr. REED. Suppose he has held it for three-quarters of its life and sells it at 99?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well. He will then take credit for three-quarters of 4 per cent.

Mr. REED. That is the businesslike way of doing it; but under the present regulations of the Bureau of Internal Revenue the whole amount would be considered to be capital gain.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is a very easy thing to figure out how much of the appreciation is interest upon his investment and how much is actual gain by reason of the sale.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the theory of the bill is that if the bills are tax exempt, the Government of the United States can make more out of their sale because of a lesser rate of interest than it can by taxing capital gain if a profit should be made. No interest is involved in it at all; there is no interest to be collected on the bills; they are sold without interest; and the Secretary of the Treasury believes that with the words which have been referred to in the bill the Government will get more for the securities than if it imposed a tax upon whatever the interest might be.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand that perfectly well; but if I discount a bill for $100 at the bank, and I get only $96, I am paying 4 per cent interest, or substantially 4 per cent; and the difference between the $96 and the $100 is interest. It can not be designated in any other way, and that is the way it is understood. So when the Treasury discounts its bills at 4 per cent, that 4 per cent represents the interest which the Government pays.

If the interest is exempt, as provided in the bill, and the principal is exempt, as provided in the bill, if the purchaser of the bill sells it meanwhile, and makes a profit on his sale, why should not that profit be taxable just the same as the profit he makes on the sale of stocks or anything else?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, is not this a simple illustration? If the Government sells to you a $1,000 bond or certificate of indebtedness on a 4 per cent basis, and you turn around and sell it on a 3 per cent basis, the difference is profit.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Unquestionably.

Mr. COUZENS. That is the simple way of putting it. In other words, if the Government sells the certificate to one individual on a 4 per cent basis, and he turns around and sells it on a 3 per cent or 2 per cent basis, the difference is profit.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. I want 4 per cent on my money, and I buy the bill; but I find some one who is perfectly content with 2½ per cent, and he will offer me a premium for it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it seems to me these questions have brought the issue down to the real point. What actually happens in the case of the transaction described by the Senator from Montana is that a negotiable instrument is bought at one price, and subsequently sold at another; and the profit, taken in connection with the time the bill is held, is a capital gain which is the equivalent of interest on that money.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no!

Mr. REED. It is just a matter of definition. Please indulge me until I finish the thought. Now, if we can agree that the amount of the discount at which the bill was originally sold shall be considered as interest, and that that shall be nontaxable, while at the same time any transactions relating in capital gains pending the maturity of the certificate should be taxed, I think we should all be agreed on the situation. All the Treasury wants is to make that which is in good faith the equivalent of interest tax free, as it is to-day on Treasury certificates; and I understand that the Senator has no objection to that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not at all. We are agreed about what ought to be done. It is simply a question as to the language in which our views ought to be expressed.

Mr. REED. It is merely a matter of expressing that thought clearly; and we ought to be able to agree on that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Utah a question. Why is section 2, on page 2, requisite at all? Why should they want to discount bills?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean line 6?

Mr. McKELLAR. Line 6:

> Treasury bills on a discount basis and payable at maturity without interest. Treasury bills to be issued hereunder shall be offered for sale on a competitive basis, under such regulations and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and the decisions of the Secretary in respect of any issue shall be final.

Why have two kinds of bills?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, these Treasury bills run for a short period.

Mr. McKELLAR. So do the certificates; do they not?

Mr. SMOOT. The certificates run for a longer time. As I explained to the Senate, but the Senator was out at the time, there are four annual periods when the Government of the United States must borrow money.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator tell me why they have the two kinds of obligations?

Mr. SMOOT. The Treasury Department now, if they are allowed to issue Treasury bills, will issue them for short periods of time. The average, as I said, would not be more than 45 days. It is just between the periods of those four payments that they want to use these bills, and they will sell them without any discount, and they think they can sell them very, very much cheaper—I mean, get more for them for the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why?

Mr. SMOOT. Because they can be purchased here and will be almost like call money. The Government can take them up at any time. It will not be as though they were running for six months, and we were paying interest on them for the full time.

Mr. McKELLAR. If they are discounted, the interest will have already been paid by the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. So it would make no difference whether or not we took them up ahead of time; we would lose money by taking them up ahead of time. Why should the Secretary of the Treasury want the power to issue bills at any discount that he may like? It is peculiar. It never has been allowed by law before. Why, at this late time, now, is that kind of a power desired?

Mr. SMOOT. The Treasury Department to-day have to assume that for the next six months their rate of interest shall be 4 or 4¼ or 3¾ or 3½ per cent, or whatever it may be.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is not any new condition. That has been going on during the whole history of our Government.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, with certificates.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Under this bill they will not have to assume any rate of interest. These bills will be sold just the same as they are sold in England, and the same as they are sold in France, and the same as they are sold in Germany and every other country. They are short-time bills, and that is why they can be sold in the middle of the month.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certificates can be sold in the middle of the month. We have been selling them for 150 years. I have heard the Senator get up here and say that the present system is the greatest system in the world, and that our financing under it, especially during the last eight years, has been simply perfect. All of that may be true; I do not know; but the peculiar thing about it to me is that after having used the system of certificates for probably more than 100 years we should now come and want to give the Secretary of the Treasury power to issue bills at a discount. When we say "discount," it means that when they are sold the Government has paid the interest on them up to the date on which they mature; and one of the reasons that the Senator gives for this provision is that the Government can take them up at any time.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it can sell them at any time.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Government takes them up at any time, it is making a gift to the purchaser of that discounted paper; and I see no necessity for it. I hope the Senator will strike out that provision. It ought not to be in this bill. There is no reason for it. It is a power that no good Secretary of the Treasury would want, and it is a power that no bad Secretary of the Treasury ought to have, in my judgment. I do not think it is right to put it in here.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the present system they sell those certificates all at once; the Government of the United States fixes the interest, and they are sold, and they have to be carried through the three months. Under the bill system we will have to raise just as much money, but the Secretary of the Treasury can sell on the 1st of the month so much, he can sell on the 15th of the month so much, on the 1st of next month so much, and the interest starts only when the sale is made, whereas if certificates had been issued the interest would have had to run the full three months.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I see no difference in the world between that and a discounted bill where the Government pays the interest in advance. To my mind, there is some reason for doing this, and the Senator has not given the reason; and we ought to have a reason before we enact it into law.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason is that the Government will save hundreds of thousands of dollars by it. That is one reason.

Mr. McKELLAR. There has been no suggestion except the Senator's statement, and I can not imagine how it could be done. It is impossible.

Mr. SMOOT. I can imagine it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator would have to imagine it, because it can not be done in business, in my judgment.

Mr. SMOOT. Not in the Senator's judgment, but it could in mine.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I believe there is an amendment pending, is there not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. McKELLAR. At the proper time I desire to move to strike out, in line 6, page 2, after the word "prescribe," the following words:

Or (2) Treasury bills on a discount basis and payable at maturity without interest. Treasury bills to be issued hereunder shall be offered for sale on a competitive basis, under such regulations and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and the decisions of the Secretary in respect of any issue shall be final.

Well, it will have to go farther than that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can perfect his amendment while the other provision is being considered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Now, Mr. President, I have a word or two to say in reference to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan. I am not going to take long.

Of course we ought not to permit to go into this bill a provision which would exempt from taxation "a gain from the sale or other disposition thereof." That is a profit. That is a capital gain, just such as any other person would make who was doing business in any other line. If he bought shares of stock or bonds of any other kind and made a capital gain, he would have to return it in his income; and it ought to be returned here. Why should it not be returned? I do not know, Mr. President, unless we have to have it; and at this time I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some very remarkable provisions in the present internal revenue law.

I happened to be in the Supreme Court of the United States yesterday afternoon when the court was rendering opinions, and I heard the Chief Justice of the United States deliver a rather witty opinion about provisions similar to the ones to which I am now going to call attention.

Exemption of capital gains, as provided in this bill, is not new. It has been in several revenue bills in a different way; and I want to call the attention of the Senate to the particular language that is used. It is marvelous language. You would think it had no meaning, sometimes; but it is fraught with meaning, and it is fraught with the greatest interest on the questions we have been discussing here to-day about stock speculation.

I call attention to section 112 of the last revenue act:

SEC. 112. RECOGNITION OF GAIN OR LOSS.—

(a) General rule.—Upon the sale or exchange of property the entire amount of the gain or loss, determined under section 111, shall be recognized, except as hereinafter provided in this section.

And then the exceptions come in:

(b) Exchanges solely in kind.—

(1) Property held for productive use or investment: No gain or loss shall be recognized if property held for productive use in trade or business or for investment (not including stock in trade or other property held primarily for sale, nor stocks, bonds, notes, choses in action, certificates of trust or beneficial interest, or other securities or evidences of indebtedness or interest) is exchanged solely for property of a like kind to be held either for productive use in trade or business or for investment.

That is the first exception.

The second exception:

(2) Stock for stock of same corporation: No gain or loss shall be recognized if common stock in a corporation is exchanged solely for common stock in the same corporation, or if preferred stock in a corporation is exchanged solely for preferred stock in the same corporation.

(3) Stock for stock on reorganization.—

And I stop here long enough to say that I am told that the stock transactions under this section amount to perhaps billions of dollars a year in this country—transactions which escape taxation entirely, although enormous profits are made under them.

No gain or loss shall be recognized if stock or securities in a corporation a party to a reorganization are, in pursuance of the plan of reorganization, exchanged solely for stock or securities in such corporation or in another corporation a party to the reorganization.

If they merge, they escape taxation. Enormous fortunes are made in this way, absolutely escaping taxation to the Federal Government. Why should not these stock gamblers, these reorganizers preying upon the public in many instances, be taxed? Why should they be exempted from taxation? It is on the same principle that it is sought to exempt from taxation capital gains in these transactions in Government securities.

(4) Same—Gain of corporation: No gain or loss shall be recognized if a corporation a party to a reorganization exchanges property, in pursuance of the plan of reorganization, solely for stock or securities in another corporation a party to the reorganization.

(5) Transfer to corporation controlled by transferor: No gain or loss shall be recognized if property is transferred to a corporation by one or more persons solely in exchange for stock or securities in such corporation, and immediately after the exchange such person or persons are in control of the corporation; but in the case of an exchange by two or more persons this paragraph shall apply only if the amount of the stock and securities received by each is substantially in proportion to his interest in the property prior to the exchange.

Under that scheme they just convey the property. For instance, if the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and I are principal stockholders in one corporation and we want to merge it or sell the stock, we first transfer it to another corporation. Say, for instance, we sell to another corporation for $2 a share stock which cost us $1 a share, but we transfer it to a paper corporation for $2 at a profit of a dollar a share. The result is that having transferred that to our paper corporation, which he and I control, for $2, we have to pay no tax on it. Then he and I take the new corporation we have formed and transfer it to the real purchaser and do not pay any tax at all. We transfer it for the $2 and do not pay any tax at all.

Listen to this:

(1) If an exchange would be within the provisions of subsection (b) (1), (2), (3), or (5) of this section, if it were not for the fact that the property received in exchange consists not only of property permitted by such paragraph to be received without the recognition of gain, but also of other property or money, then the gain, if any, to the recipient shall be recognized, but in an amount not in excess of the sum of such money and the fair market value of such other property.

That sounds as though it were meaningless, but everything in these sections has for its purpose letting stock transactions escape taxation. That is one of the reasons why we have an orgy of stock gambling in this country to-day. Every influence of law in this last act and in the preceding one has been thrown around stock transactions for the benefit of stock gamblers, and the Federal reserve law apparently is being used, certainly is being permitted to be used, in behalf of these very same stock gamblers, and why? Why will a man with money invest his money in business, in a farm, in a factory, or even in a bank, when he can go and put it on the market in Wall Street and make a greater profit? That is what has been going on for a number of years. It is just a question of when it is going to stop.

We all know it, and we are taking no steps to stop it, but, instead, we are adding to it by such laws as this, which was passed in 1928. We are adding to it again when we give the Secretary of the Treasury the power to carry on the enormous financing of the Federal Government, the greatest financing done in the world, larger in volume than any other in the world—when we give it to him and say, "All capital gains from these transactions shall not be taxed." We ought to tax them all; the Senator from Michigan is exactly right. The words which he has suggested should be stricken out of this bill, should be eliminated.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I think we have practically reached an agreement as to language which may be substituted for subsection (h). I will send it to the desk, if the Senator will permit, and have it read.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am happy to know the Senator has been successful in that.

Mr. COUZENS. I think we have arrived at an agreement on language which will suit everybody.

Mr. SMOOT. The language is perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the clerk read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, to strike out lines 1 to 11, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b) All certificates of indebtedness and Treasury bills issued hereunder (after the date upon which this subdivision becomes law) shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation (except estate and inheritance taxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States or by any local taxing authority; and the amount of discount at which Treasury bills are originally sold by the United States shall be considered to be interest within the meaning of this subdivision.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am of the opinion that that will correct the situation.

Mr. COUZENS. That accomplishes the purpose we have been trying to accomplish.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so.

Mr. COUZENS. It leaves out all reference to capital gains, so that if a security sold by the United States is held to maturity, the gain is considered as interest, and is, therefore, under the law, tax exempt, but if there is any transaction in the particular note or security afterwards in which the interest rate changes, or in which there is a gain, that gain is taxable under the existing law. To offset that, we had to eliminate from the bill reference to the deduction of losses.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan withdraw his other amendment?

Mr. COUZENS. I withdraw that, and offer this as a substitute.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I would like to have the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]. As the Senator knows, we are now having the wildest speculation in Wall Street perhaps we have ever had in the history of the country. Money is being drawn out of the channels of legitimate business to the hurt and injury of legitimate business everywhere. The gamblers in stocks up there are making tremendous profits, and the money is being invested in shares paying dividends hand over fist, tremendous dividends. That money, if it could be gotten at in that form, would be subject to taxation, but they are issuing certificates, and immediately the money is beyond the hands of taxation. Is that situation reached by the amendment?

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator does not make his question sufficiently plain, because what he refers to has no relation whatever to this bill, as I understand it. This is purely a governmental bill, which would permit the Government to sell certificates of indebtedness not bearing any interest, so that if a thousand-dollar bill were sold for $970, the bill at maturity would be collected at $1,000, and the profit would have been $30. That $30 is construed, under the amendment, to have been interest on the investment, and does not affect the situation described by the Senator from Alabama, as I understand it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does not the Senator agree with me that we ought to reach that situation? An instance was brought to my attention in which the gain was $500,000, which should have been taxed, but when the stock people issued the certificate on it and turned that over to the owner, his money was beyond taxation, it could not be reached, and the certificate could not be reached, and was not taxable. If the certificate should not be issued, then the money would be taxable. So, in order to escape taxation, they are drawing money out of the banks and using it for speculative purposes, and making their millions, and then, for the purpose of keeping the gains from being taxed, they have certificates issued, and they use them in their speculative deals frequently and escape taxation. Under that system those who are most able to pay taxes to the Government are paying least. They are escaping taxation. Does not the Senator agree with me that that ought to be reached?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

AMENDMENT OF TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, Senate bill 60, Order of Business No. 5, to amend subsection (a) of section 26 of the trading with the enemy act, so as to authorize the allocation of the unallocated interest fund in accordance with the records of the Alien Property Custodian, has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] was interested in that bill, and I think if the Senator from Utah wants to take it up, that Senator ought to be here.

Mr. SMOOT. If there is any objection to the bill, I will not ask for its consideration at all. I can not conceive of any objection to it.

I see the junior Senator from Montana has just entered the Chamber, and I would like to ask him if he has any objection to Senate bill 60, relating to the authorization of the allocation of the unallocated interest fund in accordance with the records of the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. WHEELER. No; I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah desire to ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to which he has referred?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, I do; and if any objection is raised, I shall not ask that we go on with the bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 60.

Mr. NYE. I shall not object to that, providing there can be assurance that this will not carry over into to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. If any real objection shall be made—and I can not see why there should be any—I will withdraw the bill at any time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the bill be explained for the information of the Senate. Then the Chair will submit the request of the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The quickest way of explaining the bill, I dare say, would be to read the Secretary's letter, and I will ask the Senate to listen to it. The Secretary says:

Section 26 (a) of the trading with the enemy act, which was added by the settlement of war claims act of 1928, provides that the Alien Property Custodian shall allocate the so-called unallocated interest fund among the various trusts held by him and that this allocation shall be based upon "the average rate of earnings" determined by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the entire fund.

The Treasury records fix the date upon which interest begins to run as the date upon which the funds were deposited in the Treasury. The records of the Alien Property Custodian naturally give the date upon which the money first came into his hands, but not the date of the deposit in the Treasury. The number of days intervening, of course, vary with each trust. The report of the Finance Committee and the amendment agreed to by the Senate and finally enacted indicate clearly that the allocation should be based upon the records of the Alien Property Custodian, and the Treasury and the custodian agree that this is the better policy.

Although the matter seems of rather trivial importance, the practical situation at present is that the allocation and payment of the fund can not be made. The average rate of earnings determined by the Treasury can not be used by the custodian because of the above difference in the period of time that the funds of any particular trust were on deposit, and the Secretary of the Treasury can not certify a rate adjusted to accord with the custodian's records.

Accordingly, I am transmitting herewith a proposed amendment to authorize the allocation in accordance with the records of the Alien Property Custodian. On account of the obvious desirability of distributing the funds promptly, the custodian and I join in recommending the adoption of the amendment as early as possible in the special session about to convene.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand it, the custodian obtains certain money?

Mr. SMOOT. It is paid first to him.

Mr. SWANSON. He deposits it in a bank?

Mr. SMOOT. He deposits it with the Treasury.

Mr. SWANSON. How much of an interim was there?

Mr. SMOOT. Sometimes it was one day, sometimes it was from Saturday until Monday.

Mr. SWANSON. There never is any long time? The bank does not hold the money a long time?

Mr. SMOOT. The Alien Property Custodian deposits it with the Treasury.

Mr. SWANSON. He had a check on a bank and that bank held the fund until he deposited it in the Treasury and the Treasury collected from the bank.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. Was there any length of time in which the bank had the money to use?

Mr. SMOOT. None at all, or just a day or two. Not only that, but at the last session of Congress, when we passed the alien property bill, there was a specific provision in the bill that the allocation should be upon the date on which the money was deposited with the Alien Property Custodian. That is all there is to the legislation.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator tell me just how much they are getting on the Alien Property Custodian funds at the present time? What interest is being paid on those funds?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is 4 per cent, but I am not sure.

Mr. WHEELER. During the time of the investigation which we conducted into the Department of Justice Miller stated they were getting something like 2 per cent, and the money was being deposited around in favored banks in accordance with Miller's own views about the matter. I was wondering whether or not that practice had been corrected and if they were depositing in banks yet.

Mr. SMOOT. This only applies to the interest——

Mr. WHEELER. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say what the policy is now. I think they deposit directly in the Treasury now. All the bill does is to provide the positive date upon which the interest shall be paid by the Government.

Mr. WHEELER. I understand that.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand it, the custodian sells some property, the custodian gets a check to pay for it, and that check is deposited in a bank, and in a great many cases they get 2 per cent on that fund.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the check goes to the Treasury Department now.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not want the Government to pay interest on these funds from the day they get to the custodian, when the custodian deposits the checks in a bank and gets 2 per cent on the funds and the bank pays nothing to the Government, but the Government pays interest from the day the custodian had deposited the check. If the Senator assures me that is not done, I have no objection.

Mr. WHEELER. During the investigation to which I refer it was disclosed that funds of the Alien Property Custodian were being deposited, some of them in Harry Daugherty's bank in Ohio at 2 per cent; that is, the bank was paying 2 per cent. I want to know whether that practice still exists.

Mr. SMOOT. All the funds of the Alien Property Custodian are deposited with the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. I had supposed that was true at that time, too.

Mr. SMOOT. I will assure the Senator that it is true at this time.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the amendment compel the Government of the United States out of the Treasury to pay interest on these funds from the day the custodian receives them, even if the custodian deposits them in a bank and gets 2 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. I never heard of that before.

Mr. SWANSON. I want to know whether that is the practice and whether the Government is protected. I am not willing for the United States Government to pay out of the Treasury interest on money from the day the custodian obtains a check, if at the same time the custodian deposits it in a bank and the bank is using that money.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not be asking for anything like that.

Mr. SWANSON. I want to have the assurance that it does not happen.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to have some enlightenment upon the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall be glad to enlighten the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. A fund is realized from the sale of a property and goes into the Treasury of the United States. Of course, the Treasury does not leave that fund there idle. The Treasury deposits in some bank. I suppose, from the initiation of the policy entered upon by Mr. McAdoo when he was Secretary of the Treasury, the bank pays the interest upon the fund. I would like to know from the Senator from Utah what rate of interest the Government gets on its bank deposits and what rate of interest it pays eventually to the claimant when it makes settlement?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether the Secretary of the Treasury has any fixed rate of interest upon daily balances. I can find out for the Senator, and am perfectly willing to have the bill go over if the Senator wishes it. I am quite sure there is no change in that policy. The money that is paid in that way may have been used for the very purpose of buying bonds or refunding our obligation. There is no reason why it should not be used in that way. The Treasury is responsible for the money, of course.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What I would like to know—and it seems to me the Senate ought to have the information—is whether the Government is actually a substantial loser on these transactions. The property is sold and the money goes into the Treasury of the United States. It pays what rate of interest to the claimant for the time that the Government holds the money between the time that it realizes upon the sale of the property and the time it is paid back?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not positive, but I think it is about 4 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is my understanding, that the claimant gets the amount which the Government received with 4 per cent interest. During the time the Government holds that money what rate of interest does it get upon the money or does it get any?

Mr. SMOOT. The money can be used for the payment of our bonds which would be drawing more than 4 per cent in some instances.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I had the idea that that was regarded as the trust fund that could not be used.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it could be used, but it is kept as a trust fund. What I mean to say is that the amount is always a trust fund and the Treasury keeps it. In the distribution of it it is made in accordance with the alien property bill passed at the last session of Congress. I could not say exactly what interest the Government is drawing upon bank deposits. I have never asked any question about it, nor would I say whether this money had been used for the purchase of our own securities. I think a great many of them are purchased in that way. When the time comes for payment, then the Treasury raises the money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would be interesting and valuable information to know how long the Treasury keeps this money and what the difference is between what it pays and what it realizes, so that if necessary some action could be taken to expedite the distribution.

Mr. SMOOT. That action has already been taken. If it had not been done, the distribution would have had to be made on the old basis.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the bill should go over until we get further information.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I would like the Senator to ascertain whether the United States Government under the terms of this bill would pay interest in excess of what it received. I think these people are entitled to all the interest derived from their funds that we get as trustees, but I do not like to see a method of bookkeeping by which there would come out of the Treasury money in excess of what the Government receives.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, when this matter came up a few moments ago I went to the telephone and talked to Judge Abbott, who is the representative of the Alien Property Custodian, the custodian himself being out of the country at this time. He told me that up until three or four years ago there were probably 300 or 400 depositaries where the Alien Property Custodian moneys were placed, but that after some investigation held by the Senate all those moneys were drawn in and now all the moneys of the Alien Property Custodian are deposited with the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I stated. I will say to the Senator from Montana that when these funds are deposited the Treasury purchase our own bonds, perhaps drawing the same rate of interest or maybe a little more, and hold them, and when the time comes to make the payment, if they can do so without the sale of the bonds or without borrowing money, they do it. I do not think they have a lot of money lying idle in that way, but I will find out.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator will ascertain whether the bill provides that the interest these people receive for this trust fund shall be exactly the amount that the United States Government receives, no more and no less. I think that is right. I am not willing to consent to the passage of the bill when I have not any assurance that we do not pay more interest than we receive.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I think I can explain the matter very quickly. Under the act approved March 10, 1928, all sums held by the Alien Property Custodian are authorized and directed to be invested in participating Treasury certificates at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, so that all of those several sums coming into the hands of the Alien Property Custodian now on the request of the Secretary of Treasury are carried into the Treasury, invested in participating Government certificates, and bear a fixed rate of interest. That rate, of course, is fixed in accordance with the prevailing rate paid by the Government at the time.

Mr. SWANSON. The bill provides that the rate of interest shall start from the minute the fund gets into the hands of the Alien Property Custodian and not in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no; that is not the purpose of the bill. If the Senator will permit me, I will explain. These several sums of money come into the hands of the Alien Property Custodian on account of different trusts. On the request of the Secretary of the Treasury they are invested in certificates. The money coming from the various trusts is invested in certificates. The Treasury is to make allocation of its interest to the several trusts used in the purchase of the certificates by taking the average rate of interest which the certificates bear.

The Treasury Department had difficulty in making its calculation for one simple reason. The money was actually deposited with the Treasury and actually invested in participating certificates on a date different from the date on which the Alien Property Custodian actually received the money, but it makes no difference whether the interest is allocated upon the date of the receipt of the money by the Alien Property Custodian or the date of the receipt of the money by the Treasury, because what the Treasury pays out is simply the average interest that the certificate bears, but it makes some difference as between the trusts; that is all.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is what the Treasury Department says——

Mr. McKELLAR. Will not the Senator, before the bill shall be further considered, obtain a full statement of the funds involved so that we may understand just exactly what amounts are on hand and the interest they are bearing, and information of that kind?

Mr. SMOOT. I will be glad to do so; but I think we ought to pass the bill at this session.

Mr. McKELLAR. It may be very necessary that it should be passed; I am not disputing that at all; but I merely want to obtain full information as to how the moneys are held and all other facts concerning them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah withdraw his request?

Mr. SMOOT. I withdraw the request.

RECESS

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 5, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, June 4, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou who wilt not break the bruised reed, do Thou hear our prayer. Out of the depths of our helplessness and because of our tendencies do we call upon Thee. Just now let silence rest upon our souls, that Thy Spirit may whisper sweetly. These servants of the Republic, who direct the sentiments of the state, give them a special benediction. Bless and guide them with a brave heart, a calm mind, and an undaunted spirit. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 108. An act to suppress unfair and fraudulent practices in the marketing of perishable agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce; and

S. J. Res. 50. Joint resolution to provide for the observance of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 61. Joint resolution to amend the appropriation "Organizing the Naval Reserve, 1930";

H. J. Res. 82. Joint resolution making appropriations for additional compensation for transportation of the mail by railroad routes in accordance with the increased rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

H. J. Res. 84. Joint resolution extending until June 30, 1930, the availability of the appropriation for enlarging and relocating the Botanic Garden.

BRENDAN A. FINN AND MISS AMY M. STRILEY

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, for the past seven years the Highway Education Board located in this city has conducted a safety campaign through the public schools of every State in the Union. Each year this organization awards a cash prize and a gold medal to the pupil in each State who writes the best essay on highway safety. This year the national board of judges, composed of Mrs. James J. Davis; Dr. Ernest W. Butterfield, commissioner of education for New Hampshire; and the late Haley Fiske, president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., by a process of elimination chose the best essay from the State medal winners, and the one so chosen was declared the national winner and awarded a week's visit in the Nation's Capital. This year there were over 600,000 contestants. Yesterday Brendan A. Finn, 11-year-old schoolboy neighbor of mine, of Somerville, Mass., was received by President Hoover and presented with a certificate of award. Following this event, he was presented with a gold watch suitably engraved with a record of his achievement by Mr. Alvan Macauley, president of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce.

In addition to the pupils' competition, there was another contest for the elementary-school teachers of the Nation for the best lessons on highway safety. Miss Amy M. Striley, a constituent of my colleague [Mr. ANDREW], and a teacher in Beverly Farms School, Beverly Farms, Mass., was named the winner of this contest. She, too, is enjoying a visit to Washington, and was presented with a check for $500 by President Macauley at a luncheon in honor of the winners of this contest. The judges in the lesson contest were Dr. Uel W. Lamkin, president of the National Education Association; Dr. A. T. Allen, State superintendent of public instruction for North Carolina; and Frank T. Sheets, chief highway engineer for Illinois. There were over 100,000 contestants for this prize.

As a Representative of Massachusetts and a resident of the home city of the pupil who won this national distinction I am more than pleased to have as my guests to-day Brendan A. Finn, of Somerville, Mass., and Miss Amy M. Striley, of Beverly Farms, Mass.

The problem of safety on our highways is one of great local and national importance. These contests have been found most valuable in instructing the children of the land in the elements of safety and impressing upon their minds the necessity of careful observance of safety rules and regulations. This is the first time that both of these prizes have been won in the same State. Massachusetts is proud of both teacher and pupil and rejoices in their valuable contribution to the protection of lives and limbs of the people of the Nation. [Applause.]

THE LATE HENRY M. GOLDFOGLE

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, at this very moment in the city of New York a grief-stricken yet grateful public is paying its last full measure of devotion, its sincere tribute of admiration, its homage and respect, and, above all, its genuine and heartfelt loss to a former Member of the Congress of the United States, Henry M. Goldfogle, who has passed beyond the great divide and is now a citizen of the kingdom of eternity.

As a distinguished Member of this historic forum from the year 1901 to 1915 and from 1919 to 1921, he has been a conspicuous and distinguished servant of his constituency, and has served loyally and faithfully the best interests and traditions of our Nation.

Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, in the transient life of man no one has yet fathomed the mystical problem of life. In other words, the mystery of whence we came and whence we go.

In life we live in two worlds. One the universe of reality and the other the world of idealism.

The world of reality is the world of struggle, toil, and drudge. The world of idealism is the world of fantasy, dreams, and imagination. The world of reality is contaminated, polluted, and defiled. The world of idealism is pure, immaculate, and clean. The world of idealism is the place to which God descends while man rises to meet Him.

When strife, discord, and dissention attack us in this world of reality we love to flee to the world of happiness, contentment, and idealism, where mankind is at peace with his Maker and with the world.

Through our conduct, action, and behavior in the arena of life we build a future temple for the repose of our soul in the great hereafter. This ideal temple has four walls. The first wall is dedicated to science and its object is to seek and attain the truth, for which millions of men and women have given up their lives.

The second wall is consecrated to our emotions, and the highest object of our feelings is love, which cements and binds mankind to his fellow man. It is one of the great attributes that makes life worth living.

The third wall is sacred to the noblest attributes of nature and the physical world, which is beauty. Nothing is more majestic nor sublime in this world than love of the true, the good, and the beautiful in life.

The fourth wall is hallowed by being erected to justice. Justice that is symbolized by the "scales" that balances fair play and righteousness to every man and woman who seeks human and divine equity for work rendered in this world.

The password that permits an individual to enter into this great ideal kingdom of eternity is "Service." To me, ladies and gentlemen, that man serves his country most loyally who serves humanity most faithfully.

Our former colleague and associate, Henry M. Goldfogle, has joined the great caravan from whose bourne no traveler ever returns. As a disciple of truth, as an apostle of love, as an exponent of beauty, and as a former judge who held the scale balanced in his distribution of justice between rich and poor, high and low, success and failure, he has entered the gate of eternity through the services he has rendered to his fellow man.

Let us sincerely hope and trust that as his spirit marches down the aisle of eternity, the music of his good deeds in this world will ring in his ears, and as he stands naked before the great white throne of God, let us hope the great Supreme Architect of the world, because of his eminent and conspicuous services rendered to his fellow man, will have compassion on his soul and grant him eternal rest and eternal peace. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in relation to the pending census and apportionment bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has the right, under the order granted in respect to extension, for five legislative days.

ARTICLE BY CARL D. SHOEMAKER

Mr. KORELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to insert therewith a short excerpt regarding the President.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KORELL. Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in inserting the following excerpt from a news article written by Carl D. Shoemaker, a correspondent for the Portland Bulletin, of Portland, Oreg., relative to the President of the United States:

HOOVER TO MAKE GOOD PRESIDENT

President Hoover has a greater background of experience in world affairs than any other man who has occupied the White House. No one has ever brought to the Presidency such a deep insight and knowledge of the problems, relationships, and cross currents involved in the holding of that office.

His career reads more like a romance than otherwise. His early days in Iowa and Oregon, his years as a worker-student at Stanford, his travels and labors in far-away continents, his contacts with the great and influential in almost every land, his masterful service to the starving of Belgium and other peoples, his tremendous task as Food Administrator during the war, his reorganization of the Department of Commerce, making it one of great service to the country—all were but preparation for his supreme task—that of giving to the United States an era of construction, a reorganization, and a rebuilding of the national structure.

Herbert Hoover, the President, is going to be the same Herbert Hoover who was the able Secretary of Commerce; the same man who taught us national saving and conservation during the war in his capacity as Food Administrator. He has always had the facility of surrounding himself with men of ability. His conspicuous success as Commerce Secretary was not just luck. It was the fruit of his years of directing big things in world enterprises. When he took the department it was a weak and flabby institution, rendering small service for its cost. When he resigned after his nomination to the Presidency, it was a stalwart part of the Government, giving to the Nation's business a remarkable service. Each one of the bureaus which he found he carefully analyzed and reorganized. Only two need be cited. One is best known in the East, the other in the West.

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce was headed by Julius Klein. The work of this bureau covers the whole field of international business. It is of incalculable value to every business man in this country who seeks to use its benefits.

The Bureau of Fisheries, headed by Henry O'Malley, chosen to that place from this coast, has become the dominant factor in the fisheries of America. By a study of conditions, a sensible program of conservation has been worked out which aims at a continuation and perpetuation of the fisheries on the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Gulf coasts.

These bureaus have by the sheer force of the leadership of their directors, grown from obscurity to world-wide recognition. What has taken place in these two instances is true of the many other bureaus under the Department of Commerce. Hoover never had any scandals in his department and he will not have any as President.

His choice of assistants for public service is remarkable for the character of the men selected. No one ever worked under him who did not sooner or later become his ardent supporter and friend. It is this trait in the President that augurs well for his administration.

He is his own thinker, but he listens well to advice and keeps an open mind on public questions. His contacts on every corner of the globe give him a grasp of affairs which will be of enormous benefit in our relations with other countries.

ADDRESS OF HON. RICHARD YATES, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein an address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES] at the Antietam National Cemetery on Memorial Day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, on Memorial Day, May 30, 1929, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, Hon. RICHARD YATES, who is held in such high esteem in this House, was the principal speaker at the annual memorial services held at Antietam National Cemetery, near Sharpsburg, Md.

Representative YATES has spoken before in western Maryland and our people have been charmed by his personality and ability and by his wide knowledge of our country's history and institutions, as well as his personal acquaintance with many of the leading statesmen of this and other countries.

And so I deemed our section honored when he accepted the invitation extended to him to deliver the principal address for us at this national shrine which each year holds out the great struggles and lessons of the past as an example and inspiration to the coming generation to emulate the exalted heroes of those troublous years of 1861 to 1865.

Our journey to the cemetery took us over the winding roads, beautiful hills, and dales of western Maryland, and Congressman YATES manifested a deep and reverent interest in the scenic and historic country through which we passed. First on our way was the bowlder on the old Georgetown Pike where Washington and Lafayette were met by the cavalcade of horsemen from the city of Frederick (then Fredericktown) and were escorted to the city, where for two days they were entertained in a manner befitting the fame and hospitality of that period in Maryland history. Next was the crossing at the Monocacy River, where the Battle of Monocacy was fought, and the Union forces, under Gen. Lew Wallace, held the Confederate forces, under Gen. Jubal Early, whose objective was the National Capital. As Pond's History of the Civil War tells us, "Hours counted in the rescue of the National Capital; and apart from the delay caused to the invading army, Wallace's merit is that he went to the right place at the right time"; and as he reported to General Grant, "I did as I promised—held the bridge to the last."

We rode on past the grave of Francis Scott Key, whose immortal lines penned in the "dawn's early light" have become the national anthem, and then stopped for a few moments at the home of Barbara Frietchie, immortalized by Whittier's poem, and resumed our journey across the Middletown Valley to South Mountain, where General Reno held the mountain pass against the invaders and gave up his life in defense of his country. Then on to the beautiful battle field of Antietam, where for three days more than 100,000 men fought back and forth across the little stream of Antietam Creek in one of the bloodiest battles of the Civil War.

The ceremonies of the day were held in the beautiful national cemetery, and Congressman YATES delivered an address so filled with inspiring reference to those of the Civil War period and so forceful in the lessons drawn that I feel privileged to insert it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in order that the people throughout the country may have an opportunity to read his splendid tribute to the few surviving veterans of that great struggle.

REMARKS OF RICHARD YATES AT ANTIETAM BATTLE FIELD MAY 30, 1929

Pardon a few sentences by way of preliminary. This is not the first occasion upon which I have had the honor and the pleasure of addressing the patriotic, progressive, powerful people of this patriotic, progressive, powerful portion of the famed, lovely, and ever-advancing State of Maryland. On several former occasions I have had that honor, and from every such occasion I have carried away with me recollections so pleasant that it would require the intervening of many years to make them a faint or fading memory—and indeed they never can be. And so I accept with pride and pleasure this brief hour of your presence. It has indeed been a pleasure to traverse to-day the enticing roads, and cross roads, up and down, along your flashing streams and green-clad valleys; to walk the streets of your picturesque town; to observe your ambitious schools and academies and your heaven-pointing churches; to admire your enchanting homes and fascinating gardens; and, most of all, to feel all about and around me the ceaseless throb of the thrill of life of a prosperous, happy, and contented people.

I shall never forget the majestic monument in the center of the national cemetery.

"Somebody must watch," once said a general. That ready, steady soldier statue, in abiding granite, watching, ever watching, spells eternal vigilance, as it looks down upon row on row of the valiant dead. Its devotion and consecration remind us of Lincoln's words:

"That from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion."

How appropriate are the words chiseled on this monument: "Not for ourselves."

Perhaps I have been egotistical, but I just felt I must accept the chance to come to this spot, so enshrined in the hearts of untold thousands, and I have accepted the call with pleasure, although I know well that many a man among you might, with more propriety and much more satisfactory results, have been honored with the invitation.

Again, by way of preliminary let me state before I say a few words upon this sweetly solemn occasion and in this imposing presence, that I fully realize that Decoration Day is imposing. It is imposing because not we only are observing this occasion. All over the land old muster rolls are being called, there is the swelling of the orator's voice and the strain of music on a thousand smiling hilltops, and new flowers are being laid on old graves, and falling tears are bedewing many a nameless lowly mound. All over the land to-day amid a deepening sentiment of brotherhood all classes and conditions combine to decorate the patriot's resting place, to recall the virtue of his life and death, and to throw upon the unresponsive sod evergreen suggestive of the life to come. All over the land to-day there are millions upon millions of us Americans standing in salute to the armies of the dead, while they, with their deeds and scenes of sacrifice, are passing in review.

It is an embellishment in any man's life to be allowed to endeavor, to the best of his feeble ability, to give suitable expression to the sentiments which have brought you here, and to the teachings of this hour.

I am satisfied that you, the hundreds and thousands here on Antietam battle ground, have no disposition to belittle or decry on this occasion any utterance of commendation of heroic deed and heroic dead.

It will serve to emphasize the magnitude of the crisis which came to this quiet place when I remind you that General McClellan in his report says that his army at the hour of battle had 87,164 men—almost 100,000. General Lee admits that in this campaign he lost 30,000 men. Let us not forget General McClellan's other statement that in this battle of two days and two nights the number of Union soldiers killed was 2,010, the number wounded was 9,416, and the number missing was 1,023, total 12,469.

Accurate figures as to the Confederate loss are not available, but General McClellan reports that his officers buried 2,700 Confederate bodies in addition to such numbers as were buried by the Confederates themselves, acting under the protection of the flag of truce asked for by them—this protection afforded them ample time which gives color to the thought that McClellan's estimate of 2,700 Confederate dead as compared with 2,010 Union dead is not an exaggeration.

Whatever the exact figures, this battle field was forever afterward a place of tragedy and mourning to at least 22,000 American families. The valor of both sides in and along the "bloody lane" demonstrated all over again that the flame of American valor will never expire upon the altar of the Nation. The 22,000 homes have possibly in the 67 years that have ensued sent forth into American life 100,000 souls, male and female, who would always have the right to claim that those homes played their part in American history.

I take the liberty, although taxing your patience, to say another thing by way of preliminary. It is a pleasure to be on the same platform on such an occasion with your own Congressman, here in this charming glade with the colors of our country in sight everywhere all about us waving in the breeze, on a day of unsullied brightness, on a summer afternoon not inclement, with an atmosphere so clear, South Mountain and all her foothills are distinctly outlined, with the music of three bands and three drum corps, and the sweet singing of the children; here on this platform containing six veterans of the Civil War, emblematic of the six Army corps which McClellan commanded here, and with the six pastors of the surrounding churches, emblematic of the eternal and fundamental righteousness of this region. I hope you will not feel that I am too fulsome when I say that you made a proper addition when you invited your Congressman to come here and speak to-day. My friend, Colonel Little, Member of Congress from Kansas, spoke here on Monday, June 3, 1918, and he had this to say about the Hon. FREDERICK N. ZIHLMAN, your Congressman:

"On that occasion the Hon. FREDERICK ZIHLMAN, the Congressman from that district, who is held in such high respect in the House, delivered an address so sensible in its purpose, so admirable in its execution, so patriotic in all its conception, so appreciatively and enthusiastically applauded by that great audience that I have felt it my duty to ask this House to permit me to extend my remarks by inserting it in the RECORD, which I now do. That the continuity of the day may be reflected on the pages of the RECORD, at his suggestion, I insert the order of exercises and program so well carried out under the auspices of the Grand Army and citizens of Sharpsburg, so well presided over by the Hon. Raleigh Sherman."

I wish to add that I know Congressman ZIHLMAN and that I have had no firmer friend than he for the past 10 years. He is worthy, he is capable, he is honest, he is industrious, he is discreet, wise, and careful when pushing one of his many measures of legislation, and he is loyal to the core to the Constitution and laws. I know that he has the confidence and esteem of every one of the 435 Members of the House of Representatives, as well as of the White House and the Senate. The people of Washington, by the thousand, are grateful to him for the consideration he has given to that city as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia; but I know more, and that is this, that it is not simply when addressing the mass of the people or when acting as chairman of that great committee he is useful and active. I know that his district is never absent from his mind, that his constituents and their claims are fully taken care of by him, and that he never lets the sun go down upon an unanswered inquiry. I congratulate you and felicitate myself that in your Congressman all men behold a true public servant.

Fellow citizens, you know the story of the Civil War. After four awful years of toil and turmoil, of struggling and suffering, of bloodshed and agony, during which untold numbers of American women and children died from neglect, or starvation, or overexertion on farms, or lonesomeness, or other privation, into the camp of the Army of the Potomac, an army which with gloved hands and paralyzed generals had been fighting the Army of Northern Virginia—a Southern Army melted and welded together and fighting as one man—into this quiet camp on a night as quiet as the quiet stars above, there walks the real and genuine spirit of real and genuine war in the person of Ulysses S. Grant—pardon me for saying Grant of Illinois—who in 1861 was made colonel of the Twenty-first Volunteer Infantry of Illinois, as your chairman, the Hon. Raleigh Sherman, has just so thoughtfully and graciously stated.

All men know what happens when Grant takes command as general in chief. There are 30 days of direct attack on the enemy in Virginia and 30 nights of "By the left flank, march!" and then Richmond is fallen, and the prisons are thrown open and the bronzed faces are turned homeward and the grand review of 1865 is on at Washington! before the President and the Congress and the awed and silent diplomats of the world.

But 400,000 souls shall see their homes no more. They lie beneath the sod of 15 States and we know that if they could be here to-day they would do so headed by Lincoln, and Grant, and Sherman, and Logan, and McClellan, and Meade, and Hooker, and Franklin, and Halleck, and Hancock, and Burnside, and "old Pap Thomas," the "Rock of Chickamauga," and Ericsson, the inventor of the Monitor, and Grierson, of the Grierson raid, and also by gallant Phil Sheridan, who in that mighty day rode down the Shenandoah Valley in victory even as in after years he rode to the rescue of flame-stricken Chicago.

We would honor and remember them all; blooms and blossoms for the nameless as well as the famous; the latter will not fail of praise, the former we will not forget. Oh, for begonia and petunia and hyacinth and fuchsia and lily and rose for the brave boy who in those days went first to the city and next to the camp and finally to the nameless mound within the enemy's lines; and oh, for camilia and lobelia and pansy and honeysuckle and scarlet verbena and delicate heliotrope and pure white jasmine and bluebells and other blooms for the sister and mother, the wife or sweetheart! How well we know that no jagged bullet ever tore its way into the heart of a boy in blue—and stopped there. We all know that the bullet went on until it found its everlasting abiding place in the heart of some suffering woman.

The conclusion of the whole matter is that we, the living, should heed the teachings of this day. The teachings are twofold—the first, that we must not forget; the second, that we must fortify in and for all the future. Fortify not only by recognizing our soldier and sailor and keeping his memory green but also by constantly rallying to the aid of our flag the entire Nation. This battle field on which we stand and these thousands of battle dead tell us there must be only one flag in the American sky; that there is no room for the red flag or any other flag but the "Old Glory" of the soldier, the red, white, and blue that your children have been singing about here to-day. The rally I am talking about must be not only of men and guns, of women and wartime service such as women have given in all our wars, but it must be a conscription of every part and parcel of the resources of the Republic.

The past teaches us that we can expect little sympathy from foreign lands. We do not forget that in the middle of the Civil War, when Europe thought that we were hopelessly divided forever, she sent three foreign armies into Mexico, who took an Austrian duke by the name of Maximilian and crowned him Emperor of Mexico. We do not forget that Europe laughed at our protests, but it cheers us to recall that when the Civil War was over and the battle fields were deserted and the batteries were silent and the camp fires were out and we were once again a united Nation, the President of the United States started Phil Sheridan for the Rio Grande, the Mexican border, with 50,000 boys in blue (whole regiments under 21 years of age). And the three foreign armies stood not upon the order of their going, but got out of Mexico with speed. I would close with the thought that the American warrior from Bunker Hill to Malvern Hill, from Malvern Hill to San Juan Hill, and from San Juan Hill to Dead Man's Hill in France, has done some wonderful teamwork. Let us never forget the necessity of such teamwork. Listen to the poet:

"It is not the guns or armament,
Or the money they can pay,
But the close cooperation,
That makes them win the day.
It is not the individual
Or the army as a whole,
But the everlasting teamwork
Of every bloomin' soul."

But, fellow citizens the Revolution brought no Decoration Day, the War of 1812 established no permanent memorial custom, and the struggle with Mexico seems to have rendered no such occasion a necessity. It was reserved for another controversy to develop so much havoc of life, to tear such gaps in the ranks of manhood, to harrow so many homes with heartbreak, and to create so much of courage and of patriotism and of zeal, as to contribute the main interest to this day and occasion. For this hour the thoughtful elders of this Nation live again in the tumultuous time of 1861.

Visions of fast-rushing events rise to-day in the mind of the middle-aged man. He remembers the preliminary excitement. The country convulsed from day to day by ominous occurrences. This State trembling beneath the mighty blows struck by renowned champions of public opinion. Every community stirred to its foundations in the mighty crisis.

At last the crash comes and the fire is opened upon and against that devoted place, Fort Sumter. The patience of the Union's friends can endure no more. The forbearance of even the Chief Magistrate is exhausted. Sorrowfully he turns from the despairing presence of the angel of peace, and reluctantly beckons to the majestic spirit of war. The peaceful people respond as though called to participate in a summer spectacle. Every county tenders its company; every city its regiment; every State its batteries. "With malice toward none and charity for all," call after call comes from the Capital for troops. The call is not in vain. Massachusetts sends her noblest, New York puts forth her proudest, Ohio furnishes her bravest, California dispatches her boldest, Illinois forwards her best, and so does Maryland. Hundreds whose names we know; thousands more whose names are to us unknown; the whole grand heroic host.

The fragrance of their memory hovers over us to-day like a benediction from the past.

"Rest on, embalmed and sainted dead,
Dear as the blood ye gave,
No impious footstep here shall tread
The herbage of your grave,

Nor shall your glory be forgot,
While Fame her record keeps,
Or Honor points the hallowed spot
Where Valor proudly sleeps.

On Fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And Glory guards, with solemn round,
The bivouac of the dead."

After the passing of 53 years probably fifteen hundred thousand of the soldiers of the Union are to-day in their graves.

The new President, leaving his Illinois home for the National Capital, is so surrounded by menacing difficulties, that he knows his strong mind, courageous heart, and mighty soul to be unequal to the unprecedented task. To his neighbors assembled to bid him farewell he said: "There has fallen upon me a task such as did not rest even upon the Father of his Country, and so feeling, I can not but turn and look for that support without which it will be impossible to perform that great task. I turn then and look to the great American people and to that God who has never forsaken them."

Grand and sublime figure, how he towers aloft in his pure nobility; how he guided this struggling and suffering country with patient, merciful hand; how he stood like a shield and a bulwark strong and firm between the Union and the perils that assailed it. Fling open the baskets! Pour forth the flowers! Cause his tomb to blush and to quiver and to glow with all the beauty and the loveliness and grace that nature can bestow, and still the spirit of the grand majestic Lincoln will break from beneath the fragrance, and rising God-like over us, reflect the light of a matchless integrity and prudence, over all that is or will be fair and good in Americanism.

Ladies and gentlemen, you and I know that Abraham Lincoln received the help that he prayed for—received it from 20,000,000 loyal hearts and from the Infinite Power on high. Abraham Lincoln put one hand into the outstretched palm of the American people. With the other he laid a strong hold of the almighty arm of the Almighty God. And standing there, supported by humanity and supported by divinity, he fought the grandest fight and won the grandest victory the human race has ever seen.

CENSUS—APPORTIONMENT

The SPEAKER. Under the resolution the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 312) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CHINDBLOM, will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 312, with Mr. CHINDBLOM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, at the close of the session yesterday afternoon the first section of the bill was read. Are amendments now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. They are.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FENN: Page 1, line 4, after the word "unemployment," strike out the words "radio sets."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 1, line 6, after the period, insert the following:

"In taking such census the Director of the Census shall caused to be registered the names and addresses of all aliens and shall have entered upon such registration a statement by each alien showing by what right or authority of law he had entered the United States."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will state the point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The amendment is not germane to the bill or to that section of the bill to which it is offered. It is not related to the subject matter. It applies to immigration, and not to the census or reapportionment. I desire to call particular attention to the latter part of the gentleman's amendment which requires a statement as to the authority of law by which the alien is in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the point of order, it is that the amendment is not germane to the bill or to the provision to which it is offered. Is that the point of order?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understood the gentleman's point of order is based on the proposition that it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Or to the section of the bill to which it is offered.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will be brief in my statement as to the propriety of this amendment.

This is a bill to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress. It covers the whole subject of taking a census of the population of the United States, and sets out the ways and means by which it can be taken. It provides the general authority of law, which is very wide in its jurisdiction in conferring power on the Director of the Census.

This particular amendment is offered to a section which provides for a census of the population of the United States, including agriculture, irrigation, drainage, distribution, unemployment, and so forth, and here is merely an amendment which sets out a new duty that is imposed on the Director of the Census under this bill for the information of the country and of the Congress.

It seems to me it is certainly germane to the general purposes of the bill and is only setting up another subject of investigation and is germane to the section to which it is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair wishes to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to the fact that the word "caused" in his amendment should be changed to "cause."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will make that correction.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Alabama will then read as follows:

In taking such census the Director of the Census shall caused to be registered the names and addresses of all aliens and shall have entered upon such registration a statement of each alien showing by what right or authority of law he had entered the United States.

While it seems to the Chair that the matter of the registration, so called, is a little vaguely expressed, its purport in connection with the context to which it is offered doubtless would be that the census enumerators would make up lists of the names and addresses of all aliens, and in connection with those lists would show by what right or authority of law the aliens had entered the United States. That is a statistical matter, it seems to the Chair. The section deals with matters of statistics and enumerates the various things which may be subjected to a statistical enumeration and ascertainment of facts. It will be noticed that the section is very broad in the matter of the subject matter of these statistics and of the enumeration. It is not limited merely to population, but in addition relates to agriculture, irrigation, drainage, distribution, unemployment, and, in the original text, to radio sets and mines. With such a large number of items named in the section as to which statistics may be obtained, it seems to the Chair that the amendment is merely an enlargement of the general purposes of the section and therefore is not subject to a point of order, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard very briefly on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the word "caused" in the gentleman's amendment will be changed to "cause."

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen, I have undertaken to set out in the phraseology of this amendment as accurately as I could the purpose sought to be effectuated.

We had a long discussion of this bill yesterday with reference to that feature of our population known as aliens, and from the responses that were received to the addresses made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and others upon this proposition upon both sides of this aisle it is apparent that this is a matter of profound interest to the Representatives of the American people.

I am not going to undertake to enter upon any prolonged discussion of the proposition involved with reference to our alien population. It has already been gone into very fully in the general debate on this bill, and I think I voice at least the sentiment of a very large part of the membership of this House when I assert that it is absolutely contrary to the genius and spirit of our institutions to have our representation in the lawmaking branch, the popular branch of the Government of the United States, based upon persons in this country of that type of man and woman who are not willing to dissolve their allegiance to their old country and do not think enough of American institutions and American protection and American rights to affiliate themselves with and at least attempt to become citizens of the United States. I say that that number of people are not representatives of the real spirit and purpose of the American Nation, and that they should not receive consideration in apportioning the men who are sent here to represent the real Americans residing within our borders.

It has been stated that there are from 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 aliens in the United States at the present time who are here unlawfully, who have been smuggled into this country, who have been bootlegged, so to speak, into the United States, who have gotten into the country illegally and contrary to the laws of our country, and they came in conscious of the fact that they were violating the laws of the country, and after they have gotten in they have made no effort to correct their illegal status in the United States. This amendment is directed solely at that class of people who are here contrary to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and in my opinion the Congress is entitled to the information called for in this amendment. If this amendment is adopted and later on it can be worked out so that an amendment may be germane to the bill, it may be the sense of this House that upon the summing up of this illegal representation you will be unwilling to have those 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 men accorded representation in the House, based upon their illegal citizenship. That is the whole spirit and purpose of this amendment, gentlemen, and I submit it to your calm deliberation as American citizens and as representatives of real American constituencies that are anxious to preserve the spirit and purpose of our Constitution and of our laws.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Has the gentleman given consideration to the amount of extra work and time that this would require? The physical labor of doing what the gentleman has asked for, it seems to me, would absolutely block the taking of the census.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can very well see that as a mere matter of economy it might not be best, but I will say to my distinguished friend from Connecticut, the leader of the majority party, that I consider this a matter of such profound importance to the Congress and to the country and the real spirit of our institutions that I think we would be justified in spending a few additional million dollars to secure this information. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Would it not be better to take it up as a separate matter? The greater part of the information the gentleman is seeking can now be arrived at through the immigration authorities.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the gentleman that I want to take the opportunity while we are considering a bill into which this very proposition enters. I want to take advantage of the parliamentary opportunity to secure an expression from the House of Representatives upon this question here and now and give the House an opportunity to vote upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I can understand the purpose of the gentleman from Alabama in suggesting an amendment of this kind. It is without doubt the most ingenious idea that has been presented for the purpose of so loading this bill and making it impracticable as to defeat its purpose. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that it is highly desirable to obtain the information which he seeks, but I can assure him he will not get accurate information by seeking to ascertain the legality of aliens who are in the United States through census enumerators. I will leave it to any man who has had any experience in the matter of immigration to say whether there is not great difficulty in ascertaining and determining whether an alien is here unlawfully or not. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama is adopted, it means that every census enumerator will be constituted into a court of special inquiry under the immigration act to ascertain whether or not an alien is here lawfully—whether he comes under the act of 1917 or the act of 1921, or whether he arrived prior to 1924, whether he is a deserting seaman and how he entered the United States—for all these facts are factors in determining his right or status in the United States. What we should do is, through the Committee on Immigration, to authorize an appropriation and have experienced men in the Immigration Service make a special investigation.

Now, gentlemen, suppose a census enumerator asks an alien who is here unlawfully, "Are you here lawfully?" And he says, "Why, according to my judgment, I am; yes." What are you going to do about it? And then, how is he going to have personal contact with every alien? Does the gentleman suppose for a moment that every citizen and every person in the United States is personally approached by an enumerator? Not at all. He goes to a home and talks to the wife or person who is there and gets a record and facts concerning that family. That is the way it is covered. It would be impossible to get in personal contact with 120,000,000 people within the time provided for by the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. In New York he goes to the janitor of a 100-tenement apartment house and gets all the information from the janitor—is not that true?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I doubt that. If he is on the job he will at least go to the head of each family. I will say to the House that what this amendment would do would only be to delay the result of the count and create confusion. It would vest in the census enumerators an authority that I am sure the gentleman from Alabama did not contemplate when he offered his amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the gentleman has drawn a wrong conclusion with reference to the purpose of this amendment. It does not require a census enumerator to constitute himself a court; it merely requires a statement as to whether or not the man who is enumerated is an alien and have him submit a brief statement of facts showing by what authority of law he is in the United States, and if he is here under a passport he would say that he was here under a passport.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That would not be sufficient. He would have to say whether he arrived under the act of 1917 or whether——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not asking for a decision of any doubtful question. I am only asking for a naked statement of the facts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But that requires a great deal more than what the gentleman contemplates.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I think not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What would be done under this amendment with an alien who came here between 1921 and 1924 as a visitor but remained as an immigrant? What would be his answer?

Mr. BANKHEAD. He would simply answer as to the facts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Or suppose he were a treaty alien, or a visitor previously admitted and prior to the act of 1924?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is it not a fact that, in order to enable the enumerator to ask questions intelligently, he would have to have an expert knowledge of the immigration law?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Absolutely.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Which would not be possessed by any of these agents.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now I want the distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], the chairman of the Committee on Immigration, to check me up if I am not correct in the statement that, in order to ascertain the status of the alien, the enumerator would have to find out from what country he came, the date he came, the ship he arrived on, and under what law he arrived here.

Now permit me to call the attention of the House to section 18 of this bill, on page 15. Why the bill itself prevents the use of any such information. Let me read:

> That in no case shall information furnished under the authority of this act be used to the detriment of the person to whom such information relates.

That in itself defeats the purpose of the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I do not blame the gentleman from Alabama for introducing this amendment, because I know he has been fed up on misinformation that has been given to the Nation by many so-called professional restrictionists without paying any attention to whether it is justified by the facts or not.

I feel that if it were possible to have such information as the gentleman from Alabama seeks I would be delighted to obtain it so that we could clearly demonstrate and prove that the charges that there are from 2,000,000 to 5,000,000 of these undesirable aliens are untrue.

Up to 1920 there was no quota basis and people could come in here under the immigration law legally, and there were very few who came illegally. Since 1920 and up to 1924 there were very few charges made that people came in here illegally, but since 1924 I concede that there were a great many seamen who deserted their ships and are still in the United States illegally; but I venture to say that if a real, honest census were taken we would find we have not more than a couple hundred thousand men in the United States who are not here in accordance with the laws of our land, and these are mostly seamen that reship. They are here for a few months and then they reship to other ports.

The charges that the gentleman from Alabama makes of the tremendous number of these men who are here disregarding our laws and the Constitution of the land are far-fetched. I hold no brief for any of them. I do not want them in the United States, and there is no man who has been more strenuous than myself in trying to obtain legislation to deport every undesirable or every one within the United States who has no right to remain here, and in this statement the chairman of the Immigration Committee and the rest of the members of the committee will bear me out.

I think it is manifestly unfair that we should make these charges against these people, charges that are, as a general rule, unfounded and unjustified. There are exceptions, surely, and some of them are not yet citizens. Why? Because we have been making it harder and harder from year to year for these men to become citizens, and it is not because they do not desire to become citizens.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to my friend, very frankly, I have no feeling with reference to this matter at all. I am not seeking to deport these men. I am not seeking to lay any burdens upon them by this amendment. I am merely seeking information that we are entitled to when we are taking a census of the United States. That is the only purpose I have in mind.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, I know the gentleman himself is broad and liberal, and I am only referring to inaccurate and misleading statements that are made from time to time. Unfortunately there are a great many American people who believe these unjustifiable statements.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin, Mr. MICHENER, and Mr. GIFFORD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is endeavoring to recognize gentlemen with reference to the two sides of the Chamber and with reference to their possible attitude on the pending amendment. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against the pending amendment, basing my objections on the clear statement of facts presented by our distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

It is amusing to see the Representatives from State delegations which will lose a Member or two under an apportionment fighting apportionment all the way down the line. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] denounce the apportionment bill and harp on the injustice in counting the aliens. I believe that one of the real duties of an American citizen is to vote at all elections, and a citizen who does not take enough interest in a government of the people to exercise his right of suffrage is just as much a slacker as a draft evader in time of war.

Let us look at the facts set out in the Congressional Directory. One district in the State of Alabama, the sixth district, cast for its Member of Congress 9,539 votes at the last election. The total vote cast for eight Representatives of the State of Mississippi, which is the State of the gentleman [Mr. RANKIN], who has been fighting reapportionment all the way down the line, was 112,550.

The gentleman from Mississippi deplores the fact that aliens are counted for apportionment and claims unequal representation due to large alien populations in States, including Michigan and Wisconsin.

The Congressional Directory indicates that in the last election 328,441 citizens voted for the Representative from the sixth Michigan congressional district.

The record shows that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUDSON] represents almost three times as many citizen voters as the entire delegation from Mississippi, yet the gentleman from Mississippi talks about unequal representation under the smoke screen of counting aliens. [Applause.]

Let us look at the voting record of Wisconsin and Mississippi in the last election in comparison with the total population of these two States according to the 1920 census. These census records indicate that Mississippi had a population in 1920 of 1,790,618. Mississippi has eight Representatives in the Congress, and the total vote cast in the last congressional election for these eight Representatives was 112,550. The census figures show that Wisconsin had a population of 2,632,067 in 1920, and Wisconsin cast a total of 896,618 for her 11 Representatives in the last congressional election. [Applause.]

I respectfully submit that southern Democrats who are talking about equality of representation and camouflaging and distort-

ing the facts under the alien smoke screen should be the last to talk about equality of representation in their zeal to defeat the apportionment bill. Under the present apportionment of Congress, when a vote is taken, eight Representatives from Mississippi cast eight votes, while the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUDSON] casts one vote, notwithstanding the fact that he has about three times as many qualified voters in his district as the entire Mississippi delegation. The gentlemen who want equal representation should bend their efforts toward the enactment of an apportionment bill. The constitutional provisions which require that aliens be counted in the apportionment are binding and I can not vote for any amendment which would nullify such provisions. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] starts going about the House like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour, I get somewhat nervous. When he talks about the Constitution he sheds light on that sacred document in inverse ratio to the volume of his voice. [Laughter.] He seems to legislate by ear, and since he is young in the Republican Party—having been out of it a few years ago—I advise him to use the touch system. [Laughter.]

He charges that only a small number of votes were cast in my district. That is true; but if he wants to see a big vote cast, let him come down there and run for Congress and let the people think there is danger of his election.

He makes me think of the old-time darkey who was employed to go on an errand late one afternoon, and decided that he would cut through a pathway and save part of the distance. A storm came on, and, as he spurred his old mule along, the rain began to fall. It grew dark, the lightning began to flash, and the storm broke in all its fury. His mule became frightened, threw him, and left him to grope his way through the darkness. He ran along the path as long as he could see by the flash of the lightning and then he would stop and tremble awhile, and the thunder would shake the ground. He was not making much progress. The storm kept growing worse. He did not know what to do. Finally he decided that he had better pray. About the time the notion struck him the lightning hit a tree pretty close by, and tore it into splinters. He dropped down on his knees and said: "O, Lord, I reckon You knows what You is doin'. I speck You knows more about what is best in a case like dis dan I does, but if it means all de same to You, I'd be powerful glad if You'd give me less racket and more light." [Applause and laughter.]

When the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] gets up to discuss an amendment, I for one would esteem it a personal favor if he would give us less racket and more light. [Laughter.]

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] ought to be adopted. We have an amendment that we intended to offer to the same effect. What does it mean? It merely means to register the aliens in this country and to show those who are here without authority. Why not?

What is wrong with that to an American citizen? Why jump on the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] says, "I do not blame him." Now, you can blame me all you want to. I represent American people and I am in favor of counting these people and finding out who is here unlawfully and deporting those criminals who are here in violation of law. I believe I represent the sentiment of the great mass of the American people in that respect.

One of these gentlemen said that there were only a few hundred thousands of them here, and another talked about what it will cost. If there are only a few of them, it will not cost so much to take their names and addresses and find out who they are and why they are here. Some one says, "You have to get the information from them." I would like to know from whom you would get this information. They are the only people on earth who can give it to you. Do not deceive yourselves, gentlemen. This amendment means the registration of aliens in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I amend that request by making it five minutes so that the gentleman can give us some light on the questions that I presented.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. I am trying to give light, but some people's minds are like the pupil of the eye—the more light you pour on them the more they contract. [Laughter.] So I am not responsible if what little I have to say does not enlighten the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin.

But I am telling you that here is the opportunity to register aliens in this country who are here unlawfully, and to get a count of them. It should be done, and I trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I find myself in rather a peculiar position to-day, standing on this floor for the first time when legislation affecting immigration and registration of aliens is being considered, and, agreeing with gentlemen who have heretofore spoken opposing this amendment, I yield to no one in my belief that aliens should be registered. I will go as far as any man in this House for a proper registration of aliens. We want results, not consequences. If this amendment is enacted, we will get consequences and not results. Many of these gentlemen who to-day are opposing this amendment have opposed all measures restricting immigration and will oppose all measures placing any restrictions upon our resident aliens. I make this statement so that you will understand that I am not opposing what this amendment aims at, but I am convinced that this is not the time or the place to legislate on this matter. If this amendment were adopted, it would not be workable. It would be simply out of the question to get any authentic information.

I want a registration, but I want a proper registration. I want a law such as is now pending before the committee which will compel these aliens to go to a proper place and there register and place the evidence before people who are capable of passing upon it.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. For a question.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Let us take, for instance, the case of an alien who is not regularly in the country, but who is asked if he is entitled to be here. Suppose he should say that he is and tells how he came in. Would that prove that he is legally here?

Mr. MICHENER. That is the fallacy of this thing. If I want a census, I say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], I want a statement other than, as was said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], that of the janitor, as to whether an individual is an alien or not. Do we want figures of that kind brought back to this Congress and sent out to the country as authentic? Are we going to permit such people to bring back to us statistics upon which we are to base final legislation? Ordinary census enumerators are not qualified to determine whether or not an alien legally entered the country. Neither will enumerators under the census law be in a position to get the facts regarding aliens. If the census of aliens is taken, it should be taken under the direction of the naturalization authorities.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Would it be a proper census taking to get information from a janitor as to the people in the entire building?

Mr. MICHENER. I do not think so. It is not done that way in Michigan. I am not from the city of Detroit, but I say to you that you will get an honest, fair census in the city of Detroit. Some one said yesterday that in Detroit there were, in 1920, some 300,000 aliens. I think it was the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES]. He said according to all reports we had many more now. He is in error. He should at least tell us where he got the report.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I will tell the gentleman where I got the report. I got it from the Immigration Bureau.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; as of 1920, taken under conditions that obtained directly after the war, before we had any immigration law. I did not have reference to the 1920 figures, but to the report that there are more aliens in Detroit now than then. There are certainly not 300,000 aliens in Detroit at this time. In Detroit we have Americanization schools, and these institutions are doing great work. The large employers in Detroit, like the Ford factory, I am advised, require citizenship or a start in the direction of citizenship as a prerequisite to employment. Large numbers of aliens are not coming in under the law and most of those entering are only too pleased to become citizens. Aliens are getting fewer each year and there is no reason why they should not be registered at the proper place and in the proper way. Statistics taken in the 1910 census, as cited by the gentleman from Kansas, may have been correct at that time.

But I challenge the statement that any report coming from the Bureau of Immigration shows that the number of aliens in the city of Detroit to-day is more than they were in 1920.

Mr. AYRES. That report was not made in 1910. It was made on the census of 1920.

Mr. MICHENER. I misspoke if I said 1910. I meant 1920.

Mr. AYRES. The supposition is that you have got more not naturalized now than you had in 1920.

Mr. MICHENER. That is an erroneous supposition.

In opposing this amendment, I repeat that I do not want to be put in the position of opposing registration of aliens. This is a census bill providing for the taking of a census primarily as a basis to reapportion the House of Representatives, and the amendment does not provide for the excluding of aliens in the count of persons when the census is taken. If the machinery provided in this bill could accomplish the purpose sought, then my attitude might be different. Those gentlemen here coming from States which will lose under a reapportionment are anxious to load this bill down with impossible things, so that it will be unconstitutional and unworkable. The State of Michigan is being deprived of just representation in this body because of the neglect of Congress to do its duty since the census of 1920. The first Congress after the 1920 census passed a reapportionment bill and has passed one reapportionment bill since that time, but the Senate has never permitted us to reapportion until the bill under consideration was passed by the Senate the other day. If impossible amendments are attached to this bill, then, of course, the Senate will not agree to the amendments and the desires of some of the gentlemen in this body will be realized, and reapportionment will again be postponed.

It is interesting to look over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and review the history of reapportionment legislation since 1920. The opposition comes from the States losing representation, although, of course, that reason is never assigned. Regardless of what the stated objections to this reapportionment bill are, I venture the assertion that this bill would be passed readily and with little, if any, opposition if every State could retain the number of Representatives it now has. That is, you would all hold your seats; that would mean possibly 540 Members in this body instead of 435. The weight of each vote would be the same if we reapportion under the Constitution.

Both the census and the reapportionment bills were given careful consideration by the proper committees of this body, as well as by the House itself. The Senate has made few changes, and I hope that this bill will be amended only by its friends and not by its enemies, and that in our zeal to "keep America for Americans" we will not make impossible the taking of the census and defer reapportionment.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is perfectly idle to argue that this amendment is advanced for the sole purpose of obtaining information. Nothing is said about what you are going to do with the information when you get it. There is the same spirit behind the amendment that pervades this whole debate, and I have only this one thought to suggest: In view of that spirit of narrowness and antagonism which pervades this country, I do not understand how any self-respecting alien stays in it. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee of the Whole, I feel it my duty in behalf of practicable and good legislation to take the floor in opposition to this amendment. I have the honor to be not only chairman of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization but a member of the Committee on the Census, and have given a good deal of study to this and other propositions that require detailed information to be taken from the census papers.

The plan of alien enrollment may be desirable, but it can not be taken in any practicable, worth-while way by census enumerators. Bear in mind that a census enumeration is one thing and the proposed enrollment of the alien is another. The paper filled out by the enumerator with respect to each person is a confidential document. The statistics thereon indicate whether or not a man is married or unmarried or divorced, and so on; and all of that is transferred to a great card system for the purpose of tabulation. Now, then, if you ask the questions proposed in this amendment, you have really got nothing. The next step would be to sift through the enumeration papers of 120,000,000 people and set aside all papers pertaining to seven and one-half or eight million aliens. What is the next step? Send investigators; and where is the law for that? Further, one could not well ask an alien who came here unlawfully into the country to incriminate himself by answering "yes" to some of the proposed questions of the enumerator. If a naturalized alien in this country prefers to say he was from Austria instead of from Poland or Germany, that lies with him. It is pretty hard to go behind his statement; so it will be with this proposal. If this were in a separate bill for the enrollment of aliens, with the proper plans for identification and for other details, I would not object to it.

Mr. TILSON. How much would it be worth, after giving all this time and attention to it? It would be worse than useless.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have undertaken to so state.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The only information requested is a statement from the alien as to how he came here. If he is here legally, he will not hesitate to come up. If he is here illegally, he will say nothing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. You will remember that the date of the basic immigration restriction law was 1917, and a great many aliens were here legally at that time. Further, under present law an alien coming before 1924 might have entered illegally and still be lawfully here now, the time limit against him having run. How would he answer? By a new law, opportunity is now being given to those who were here illegally prior to 1921 to take out naturalization papers.

Further, gentlemen, it was not until 1920 that the restricted quota law was passed, when we undertook to prescribe the number, and the status of some of those who did come under visa certificates from 1921 to 1924 is to this day uncertain. If asked, they would say they came between 1921 and July 1, 1924, legally; that is, they came with proper papers as visitors and remained as immigrants? How would they answer? After 1924 that point was cleared up.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. For how many years has your committee been working on a registration bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. For many years. We have already many bills on the so-called enrollment question. If any gentleman, including the able man who has left our committee, will indicate the machinery necessary, we will consider it.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Does not the gentleman think this would give you such information as you might desire?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not think it is a proper matter for the census, or that it can be properly carried out by the enumerators.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman said if a man is legally here he would not hesitate to answer, and if illegally here he would stand mute and not answer. The bill provides for the man who is illegally here, so that the result is that he will be punished if he refuses to answer the question, and if he does answer he incriminates himself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and besides that, you put a burden upon the enumerator that he could not perform.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to speak?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am interested in the statement just made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON]. I am one of five members of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations who handle the appropriation for the Department of Labor, and certainly no one has been more insistent than the gentleman from Washington in having the committee increase the appropriation for the deportation of aliens unlawfully here; and one reason why the committee and Congress has been slow to increase the appropriation is because we have had unsatisfactory information as to the number unlawfully here.

The gentleman often comes before the committee to urge us to accept his ipse dixit as to the number, and yet we find that when some sane proposal is made for the purpose of taking at least a step in the direction of having a survey made, he rises to oppose such step. Concede that the information thus obtained may not be as reliable as the gentleman would like it to be, certainly it is in line with what he has insisted calls for legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In a moment. If the gentleman can ask for large appropriations to deport aliens, surely he is not very consistent in now objecting that the Census Bureau be authorized to collect information as to a matter for which appropriations are annually made.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman suggest any possible way by which information of the kind proposed can be secured by enumerators and transferred to any source where it can be used? The gentleman has challenged the work of the House Immigration Committee.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The Census Bureau will collect information that will be collated in such way as to force your committee to report some bill. [Applause.]

What do we collect information for through the Census Bureau? It is in order that we may so tabulate that information that it will be of service, and if the Census Bureau collects and tabulates this information, even though the names of the parties that enter into that tabulation may not be given, you will have collected information that will cause this House to see that proper steps are taken to secure effective legislation. Surely there can be no objection to collecting information about a matter which everyone who has spoken admits should be known. Take our good friend from Michigan, who says he is in favor of restrictive immigration and in favor of registering all aliens, yet he objects to this way of getting information as to the number of aliens unlawfully here, because he feels there is force in the statement made by the gentleman from New York that sometimes census enumerators get their information from janitors. I question whether such statement will be supported by facts if you inquire of the Director of the Census. It may be that enumerators do get information from janitors, but doubtless the enumerators use such information as a basis for further investigations and inquiries. When the census survey on this matter is announced I predict that this House will pass effective legislation to require the registration of aliens and adequate appropriations will be made for the deportation of all aliens unlawfully here. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for one-half minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama may be extended for one-half minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Do I understand the gentleman concedes that the information acquired by these enumerators must be confidential and could not serve as a basis either for the prosecution or for the deportation of any alien unlawfully here?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If we pursue the same policy we have in the past in reference to such information, it would be treated as confidential.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the motion. The gentleman from Connecticut moves that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that motion by making it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to amend the motion, that debate close in 10 minutes. The question is on the amendment to the motion.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were—ayes 141, noes 115.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. FENN and Mr. BANKHEAD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 163, noes 122.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWING: On page 1, line 4, after the word "unemployment," insert "needy aged."

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, at the close of the session yesterday I took 10 minutes to make an appeal for the collection of statistics as to the needy aged. I asked that this coming census collect and publish statistics regarding the need for old-age pensions. It becomes necessary to offer this amendment at this place in order to make in order an amendment which I will offer later if this amendment carries, and for the information of the committee I will ask the Clerk to read the second amendment which I will offer later if this amendment is adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment for information.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. SWING: On page 14, after line 19, insert the following as a new paragraph:

"SEC. 18. That the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in the making of the decennial census herein provided for, to collect and publish statistics concerning the need for old-age pensions, including the number of men and women who are of the age of 65 and over, who, singly or jointly, with their respective husband or wife, if their husband or wife is living, possess property of the value of less than $3,000 or an assured income less than what would ordinarily be received from $3,000 invested; the number of such men and women who are being cared for in charitable institutions of one kind or another; also the number of such men and women outside of institutions who are wholly and in part dependent upon public or private charity."

Mr. SWING. This proposed amendment does not in any wise commit the Government to any Federal old-age pension. I am not asking for a dollar, I am merely asking for the information on which the State legislatures can properly act.

There is no other agency that can collect and make public authentic and reliable information upon this important subject.

On January 1, 1929, five States had adopted an old-age pension, but most of them so recently that there were only statistics available from two States. At the last sessions of the legislatures the matter of old-age pensions was discussed in 26 legislatures. Four of them enacted it into law and in 6 more the proposal passed in one house or the other.

It is going to be a subject of increasing interest during the coming 10 years. The collection of this information, which I say again can be had from no other source, will be a valuable contribution toward enabling the legislatures of the various States making a right decision of this great humanitarian problem. It will not be burdensome. There are only 5,000,000 persons in the United States over the age of 65. Two questions will secure the desired information which has been asked for by the welfare commissions of a number of States.

I ask your sympathetic consideration of this problem for a class of people who have no organization, who have no bloc, who have no propaganda in their behalf; a class of people whose economic condition and whose personal pride prevent them from speaking for themselves. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SWING) there were—ayes 76, noes 95.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RANKIN: Page 1, line 5, after the word "year," strike out the figures "1929" and insert in lieu thereof "1930."

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, there is no disagreement between the chairman of the committee and myself on this proposition. This was the unanimous agreement of the Committee on the Census.

The Constitution provided that we should take a census in 1790 and within every 10-year period thereafter. We took the census of 1920 in January, and if this provision should remain in the bill we would be taking two censuses within a 10-year period, and it would be in violation of the Constitution.

We have another amendment in line with this one which will be offered later.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I think you all understand clearly the purpose of the amendment and probably the reason 1929 appears instead of 1930.

It would be futile for me, and I shall not undertake, to discuss the very profound constitutional question involved in the question raised by the gentleman from Mississippi as to whether it should be 1929 or 1930. That is a matter for those of you who dwell in that field to settle for yourselves.

I am simply here presenting for your consideration the viewpoint of the men of the country as represented in their farm organizations in behalf of a census to be taken in November of 1929 instead of November of 1930.

The reasons have been very clearly set out in the debate that occurred in the Senate and I shall not repeat them here. I simply want to say that if time permitted—and it is not my purpose to delay a vote on this question—I should be pleased to present communications from all the representative farm organizations urging that the census be taken in November as opposed to May, from an agricultural standpoint.

Mr. FENN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FENN. Were those communications in regard to the census of population or in regard to the census of agriculture? The committee had nothing from the farm organizations in regard to population.

Mr. KETCHAM. It was with reference to agriculture.

Mr. FENN. This proposes to put the population back to November 1, 1929, outside of the decennial period.

Mr. KETCHAM. 1929; yes.

Mr. FENN. The Senate put them both together.

Mr. KETCHAM. The Senate put them both together, and I am opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi for the simple reason that it changes the language of the Senate bill and will, if his amendment prevails, disturb the situation that the farm organizations desire.

Mr. FENN. Does the gentleman consider the census of agriculture as more important than the census of population?

Mr. KETCHAM. I do not, and I shall be very pleased to answer the gentleman by saying that in my humble judgment a census taken in November will be fully as accurate from a population standpoint as a census taken in May, and from the standpoint of agriculture there can be no possible reason why anyone should prefer a census taken in May to a census taken in November.

Mr. THURSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. In just a moment. I understand that when I yield to a member of the committee I yield to a gentleman who is opposed to my proposition, and so I prefer to have him speak in his own time.

The reason I am advocating the proposition of a census taken in November is that for once at least a census should be taken that will afford agriculture an opportunity to get a basis for the most accurate picture that can possibly be secured, and anyone who is at all familiar with farm conditions will certainly agree that if you go to a farmer in November who has been operating a farm for the past year you will get from him a more nearly accurate picture of his farm operations for that year than you will get from the man who occupies that farm in the succeeding May and, consequently, for the reason that I believe that that census will be very much more nearly accurate. I sincerely trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi will be rejected and that the bill as passed by the Senate, where full consideration was given to this proposition, will be adopted in its stead.

In the closing minutes of my time I want to say that not only is the viewpoint expressed by the farm organizations in favor of a census in November, 1929, true but it is also true that the Secretary of Agriculture and the former Secretary of Commerce, now President of the United States, are on record as favoring the November date for taking of the combined census of agriculture and population. [Applause.]

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, the argument of convenience or inconvenience is immaterial to a decision of the pending question. We have no right to override the plainly expressed provisions of the American Constitution. [Applause.]

Article I of the Constitution carries the legislative powers—that is, it prescribes the powers vested in the legislative body of the Nation, which is the Congress of the United States.

The second section of Article I provides:

> The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States and within every subsequent term of 10 years in such manner as they shall by law direct.

We need not quibble about it, there is no way of refining an answer that will support the position of the admirable gentleman who just addressed the House. The first census was taken in 1790. The first Congress met in 1789; the first census was taken in 1790 and in every decennial term from that period to 1920. Therefore, the census under consideration, the census we are authorized to take, begins the 1st day of January, 1930, and can not be taken prior thereto.

Now, this is not my opinion alone, but the House Committee on the Census last year made a very admirable report on this precise question. I will not read all of it. It says:

> All of these enumerations have been made during the even decennial years and the committee feels that it is essential that future enumerations should be made in the same decennial period.

That committee clearly realized its obligations to the Constitution and therefore followed it. Why we should undertake to take a census when we are unauthorized by law so to do is one of those mistakes that applies to that Homeric genius that nods sometimes.

Mr. Warren, in his book on Making of the Constitution has put on page 297, which I will insert in the RECORD, the statement of all the censuses taken from 1890 down to and inclusive of 1910, also giving the dates of apportionments. Of course, the date of apportionment might be the 1st day of January, but it must be within the beginning of the period of the 10 years, and the year 1930 and not the year 1929 establishes that beginning.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman insert in the RECORD the months and years in which the censuses were taken?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have not that here.

Mr. RANKIN. I have it and I will give it to the House

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. I will give the dates of the taking of the censuses.

In 1790 it was taken on the first Monday of August; the second census was on the first Monday in August in 1800; the third census was taken on the first Monday in August in 1810; the fourth was taken in 1820 on the first Monday in August; the fifth was taken on June 1, 1830; the sixth was taken on June 1 in 1840; the seventh was taken on June 1, 1850; the eighth was taken on June 1, 1860; the ninth was taken on June 1, 1870; the tenth was taken on June 1, 1880; the eleventh was taken on June 1, 1890; the twelfth was taken on June 1, 1900; the thirteenth was taken on April 15, 1910, and the fourteenth was taken on January 1, 1920.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. FENN. From the sixth census to the fourteenth, population and agriculture were taken on the same dates, the 1st of June. From 1840 until 1920 they were taken on June 1, except that in 1910 they were taken on April 15 and in 1920 on January 1.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Those are mere details relating to the expediency of the time in which you will take the census within the decennial. The point I am trying to bring to the attention of the committee, I think will be conceded by those who have given it thorough study, is that we must arrive at a certain period within which you must act within which the census is operative. Whether it be in the spring or the fall is a detail. I contend that the Constitution prescribes that Congress shall take the census every 10 years after 1790, and that has been consecrated by the practice of this Government down to 1920.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As I understand it, the construction which the gentleman from Virginia seeks to put upon that constitutional provision is this: That while the Constitution provides that the first census shall be in 1790 and then within every 10 years thereafter we must construe "Within every 10 years thereafter" as meaning during every tenth year thereafter.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; at any time thereafter within the period of 10 years.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. "Within 10 years" is any time inside the two boundaries of the decade.

Mr. DENISON. And in that connection will the gentleman yield to one observation? The exact language of the Constitution is not in the 1790, but within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States. When did the First Congress meet?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The first census was taken in 1790.

Mr. DENISON. When did the First Congress meet?

Mr. MONTAGUE. 1789.

Mr. DENISON. It was in 1789, and if the gentleman's construction of the word "within" is correct, of course the census would have to be taken three years after that time, but, on the contrary, Congress took it within the three years, or the next year thereafter. Why should you construe the word "within" to mean a period of 10 years rather than within a period of 10 years?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I construe it as the gentleman does, within a period of 10 years. The point I make is as to when this period of 10 years commences to run. I maintain, from the practice of the Government down to this date, it begins to run on the first day of the decennial term, and a period anterior to that date is provided in the bill. We have already taken the census for 1920, and the census for 1930 must be taken within the period beginning January 1, 1930, and ending midnight of December 31, 1939.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, while the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] has presented a constitutional question, which probably erects a barrier against using a period in an odd year, yet there is a practical situation here that we must meet, and this was thoroughly considered by the committee. It is proposed to take this census in the month of November. A census of what? Not only population but of agriculture, irrigation, drainage, distribution, unemployment, mines. It is well known that the great industrial, commercial, and financial institutions of this country keep their statistics by the year. What means would we have of dividing those statistics up into 10 months of the year? There would be a great amount of confusion that would arise if we were to provide that this census is to be based as of November 1, because practically all the great business and industrial concerns in our country either have a year from July 1 to June 30, or from January 1 to December 31. So it is manifest to us that this provision as written by the Senate would be impractical and unworkable. The Committee on the Census having this in mind, provided for the full decennial period which, of course, could be divided into 10 units of one year each.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When does the gentleman consider the decennial year to begin?

Mr. THURSTON. On the 1st of January.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What authority has the gentleman to advance it to November, 1929?

Mr. THURSTON. Oh, I am opposed to taking the census as of November 1.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I misunderstood him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make one observation in support of what has been said by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. The Constitution provides that this census shall be taken every 10 years. We took the census in 1920. If we take another in 1929 we will have taken two within the 10-year period. It occurs to me that this should answer this whole proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment. There was no disagreement in the House Committee on the Census as to when this census should be taken.

This matter was gone into thoroughly by the Census Committee, and, all things considered, it was the opinion of every member of that committee that the census ought not to be taken in 1929, but that it should be taken in 1930, and in the spring of that year, not only for constitutional reasons which undeniably require the census to be taken in the 10-year period beginning with the year 1930 but because by taking the census in the spring of the year we would get a more accurate and dependable enumeration of the population in the States where they reside. Fewer people will be absent from their homes in May than in November. Then, again, we can get a much better farm census in May than in November.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; I yield to my colleague from Iowa.

Mr. THURSTON. It has been mentioned here that the membership does not understand as to when it is to be effective. It is as of January 1.

Mr. LOZIER. Yes. Something has been said about the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce wanting the census taken in November, 1929.

I will tell you the plain facts in the case. The Census Bureau, through Doctor Steuart and his assistants, came before the House Committee on the Census and agreed that the census should be taken in 1930 and in the spring of the year. These officials of the Census Bureau discussed with the Census Committee the many arguments for this or that date for taking the population census and also the farm census, census of distribution, and to secure the other statistical data to be embraced in the census, and there was complete agreement between the committee and the Census Bureau that the census should be taken in the spring of 1930, and that May was the best month when weather, climatic, and other conditions throughout the Nation were considered. It was also agreed that by taking the farm census in May, we could get a more complete farm census, because by that time all crops have been gathered and marketed and the statistics would then be available for the calendar year ending on the preceding December 31.

But after this decision was reached, Mr. Olsen, the Chief of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, came before the committee and said the Department of Agriculture wanted the farm census taken in the fall, and gave as a reason for this request that theretofore the Department of Agriculture had arranged their statistics for a year ending in November or December, and that for purposes of comparison they wanted the statistics compiled in the next census to end in the fall of the year, preferably in November or December. This gentleman also stated that practically all the crops would have been harvested and sold prior to November 1 and the returns from the sale of crops had been received by the growers by November 1. He even went so far as to say that a very considerable part of the livestock slaughtered on the farm was slaughtered before November 1, when everybody knows that because of warm weather comparatively few animals are slaughtered before the first of the year, because the farmer must wait until real cold weather before he can safely butcher. But this expert agricultural economist does not seem to have learned what every 10-year-old farm boy in America knows.

But this expert tenaciously held to a theory which was absolutely contradicted by the facts. Frequently, because of continued rains and warm weather, three-fourths of the corn crop in the Middle West has not been gathered by November 1, and we know that at that time the feed lots are filled with cattle and hogs and few farmers have marketed their livestock, the major portion of which is fattened on the corn crop grown that particular year. We know that the western farmer is not in a position November 1 to balance his accounts and make a showing of his production and income for the current year, because he has not marketed the products of his labor. On November 1 several million bales of cotton are unpicked in southern fields.

Again, in Minnesota, Montana, Maine, Vermont, the Dakotas, and other Northern States, winter has fallen by November 1, and the roads are covered with snow and ice, and travel is obstructed, or at least difficult, but by May 1 travel would be easy, returns would have been received from all crops grown the previous year, and what is more important, practically all the farm population would be at home and on the farm and be counted. It is a well-known fact that in October and November millions of farm boys go to the cities to work in the mills and factories. If the census is taken while they are away from the farms they are enumerated in distant cities and States, and as a result, the farm population is greatly reduced and the agricultural States lose Representatives in Congress and votes in the Electoral College.

I want the census taken at a time the farm population is on the farm so the agricultural States may get their just proportion of the Representatives in Congress and their proper share of votes in the Electoral College. And it is quite generally agreed that in the month of May more of the farm population is at home, on the farm, than in any other month of the year. Therefore, in justice to the agriculture classes, I insist on the census being taken in May and not in November.

But in order to set aside the combined judgment of the Census Committee and the Census Bureau, the politicians of the Agricultural Department went over the heads of the officials of the Census Bureau and did some logrolling with the Department of Commerce, and, as a result, an equivocal letter was sent to the Census Committee signed by the Secretaries of Commerce and Agriculture saying it would be satisfactory to have the census taken in the fall of the year, but the Census Committee, well knowing that this letter had been secured by logrolling, ignored it and agreed unanimously that, in fairness to all classes, the census should be taken in May and not in November, because no one will deny that millions of farmer boys have gone to the cities to work in the mills and factories and would not be counted in the States where they really lived, but would be counted as a part of the city population in some industrial State, and as a result, the State in which they really live would have its representation cut down and its vote in the Electoral College reduced. In common fairness and honesty, we should hold tenaciously to May as the month in which the next census shall be taken.

It is conceded that when the 1920 census was taken many farm boys were yet in the Army and millions who had been discharged had not yet returned to the farm, but were working in the factories and waiting for spring to come to return to the farm. Taking the census in January, 1920, when the roads were impassable and the weather exceedingly severe was a grave injustice to the agricultural classes.

Yesterday in the course of the general debate on the pending bill I gave some reasons why, in my opinion, aliens should not be counted in determining the population for the purposes of apportioning representation in Congress. I desire to make some additional observations on the same subject.

May I say in the beginning that I have a profound respect for the foreigner who left his native land, came to our country and was naturalized, and became a citizen of this great Republic. By reason of his naturalization he becomes a 100 per cent American and is entitled to all the privileges and immunities incident to citizenship in our outstanding Republic. Since 1820 more than 37,000,000 foreigners have come to the United States, and a vast majority of them became citizens and members of our national family because they voluntarily became naturalized and loyal, upstanding citizens, who contributed much to the development and material and moral progress of our Nation.

And I have no ill-will toward the foreigners who have come to our shores but who have not been naturalized. I would do them no harm but, inasmuch as they are enjoying the blessings of civil and religious liberty under our flag, I do think they should show their appreciation and interest in our institutions by becoming naturalized citizens. According to the 1920 census we had a total population in the United States of 105,710,620, of which 98,283,016 were native or naturalized citizens and 7,427,604 were aliens.

In other words, in 1920, 1 in every 13 persons in the United States was an alien. In an apportionment under the 1920 census, one-thirteenth of the membership of the House would be based on the alien population. In other words, about 31 of the 435 Members of the House would represent an alien population and the other 404 would represent the native born and naturalized citizenship of the United States. And under such an apportionment 31 electoral votes would be based on the alien population and the other 404 electoral votes would be based on the native born and naturalized population.

By not excluding aliens, you are taking from the native and naturalized population, 31 Representatives and 31 electoral votes and giving these 31 Representatives and 31 electoral votes to our alien population. I do not think this is fair to our native born or to our naturalized foreign-born population. Our citizens, whether native or naturalized, are of our own household faith, and we certainly ought not to take these Representatives in Congress and these electoral votes from them and give them to the foreigners who have never shown enough interest in our institutions to enroll themselves under our flag.

By not excluding aliens, we are not doing justice to our foreign naturalized citizens. We are discriminating against the naturalized foreigner and in favor of the alien foreigner. We are taking 31 Representatives and 31 electoral votes away from our foreign population who have become naturalized citizens and we are giving these 31 Representatives and 31 electoral votes to the unnaturalized foreigner. If the unnaturalized foreigner is to be treated as well as or better than the naturalized foreigner, what inducement is there to foreigners to become citizens of our Republic?

The following table shows the status of our foreign-born population in 1920:

White foreign population, naturalized	6,285,150
Alien or unnaturalized population	7,427,604
Total white foreign population	13,712,754

It will be observed that in 1920, 54 per cent of our foreign white population was unnaturalized and only 46 per cent naturalized.

According to report issued by the Census Bureau in 1922, there were five and one-half million foreign-born white population of voting age in the United States, 2,800,000, or 52 per cent, of which was naturalized, and 2,220,000, or 40 per cent, of which was not naturalized. Now, some of you gentlemen insist on counting these 2,000,000 aliens of voting age, as well as several millions more under the age of 21 years, when you apportion the membership of this House among the several States. I submit that this method is not fair to the native-born population, nor is it just to the foreigners who have come into our midst and by naturalization become citizens and defenders of our flag. I say that we should treat the alien fairly, deal justly with him, do him no wrong; but, on the other hand, we should not count him when we apportion the membership of this House and votes in the Electoral College among the several States.

According to the 1920 census, the population of continental United States was approximately 106,000,000, made up of the following racial groups:

Native white population	81,108,161
Foreign-born white population	13,712,754
Colored or negro	10,463,131
Indian	244,437
Chinese	61,639
Japanese	111,010
Filipinos	5,906
Hindus	2,507
Koreans, Siamese, Hawaiians, Malays, Maoris, and Samoans	9,488

The following table shows the alien population in the United States according to the 1920 census:

	Federal census Jan. 1, 1920
	Total population	Aliens

Therefore it is not strange that practically all the great cities want aliens included in the count so their States may have a larger representation in Congress than they would be entitled to if aliens are excluded from the count. If these millions of aliens want to be counted and want representation in Congress and in the Electoral College let them become naturalized and take the oath of allegiance to our country and flag as has been done by millions of other foreigners who by becoming naturalized citizens have become our brethren and members of our own household.

Ten States in 1920 had an exceedingly large alien population, as the following table will show:

California	453,397
Connecticut	233,634
Illinois	543,528
Massachusetts	629,277
Michigan	383,583
New Jersey	421,551
New York	1,609,190
Ohio	372,925
Pennsylvania	795,330
Wisconsin	203,888
Total alien population in 10 States	5,645,303

Under the last apportionment each State was allowed one Representative for each 211,000 population. On that basis these 10 States, under the 1920 census, would have been given approximately 25 additional Representatives on account of these five and one-half million aliens, while that number of Representatives would have been taken from the States whose population is largely native and naturalized.

I repeat, that to count aliens is not fair to the native population and not fair to the foreign-born inhabitants who have by naturalization become citizens.

By glancing at the foregoing table you will readily understand why these States with an enormous alien population want aliens counted for the purpose of apportioning Representatives, because under that method they get about 25 additional Representatives and 25 additional electoral votes to which they are not entitled.

I may add that nearly all the foreign-born population in Missouri are naturalized citizens and the great majority of them are as high-class men and women as can be found anywhere. And I am not willing to take away from the native and naturalized citizen of Missouri two or three Congressmen and two or three electoral votes and give them to the unnaturalized foreign-born population of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and California. We certainly owe a higher duty to our native and naturalized citizens than we owe to the millions of unnaturalized foreigners who enjoy the blessings of our Government but refuse to become citizens of the Nation that protects and enriches them. I therefore appeal to the membership of this House to write into this bill a provision that will exclude aliens from the count when the population is ascertained for the purposes of apportioning Representatives in Congress among the several States. Such a policy is founded on reason and common sense. [Applause.]

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DICKINSON: Page 1, line 4, after the word "distribution," strike out the word "unemployment."

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, my purpose in presenting this amendment was to take cognizance of the fact that unemployment is a transitory thing. We are unable to determine just what unemployment is. You may not be able to say when a man is out of work. It depends on the time of the year as to whether a man is working or not working. This census ought to be a statistical census for the purpose of counting our population and determining the statistics necessary on which we can base our reapportionment program. The idea as to whether a man is employed or not is an entirely different question, and you should not cumber this census with detailed information as to unemployment. You can go to the Department of Labor for that information. I hope the amendment will be agreed to. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, it is an easy matter of fact to ascertain whether or not a man or woman has a job.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In a moment. Let me just finish one sentence at least.

Mr. DICKINSON. If you had a job one day and did not have it the next day, what good would that information be?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What we want to know is how many people are unemployed. It is not necessary to be a lawyer or a sleuth or an investigator to get that information. Just a few moments ago the gentleman from Iowa went through the tellers and voted for an amendment which requires a judicial investigation.

Mr. DICKINSON. I happened to be with the gentleman on that motion and did not so vote.

Mr. ARENTZ. What we want to determine is how much work a man has had during the period of a year. It is not a question of whether he worked yesterday or to-day. It is a question whether he has worked long enough to support his family.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. We want information to determine whether we have real prosperity or a stock-ticker prosperity.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Would not that be the same information as is obtained by the Labor Department?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. I hope the gentlemen on this side who have done so much to destroy the bill will at least not support this amendment.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that no good can come from leaving in this measure the word "unemployment." I will tell you why. If you take a census of unemployment to-day it would be of no value six months from now.

The only value of a census of unemployment would be that it might be of service for the seasonal period in which it was taken.

Then, I wish to call your attention to this fact: The Appropriations Committee is proposing and this Congress is voting each year many thousands of dollars to the Labor Department for the purpose of keeping current the matter of unemployment in this country. If you were to go to the Labor Department to-day and inquire as to the number of unemployed men and women in the United States you could get a very accurate figure, and that department has been gathering such figures for some three or four years.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. During the investigation of that question by the Senate the Labor Department was called on for figures, and the figures they furnished were approximately only 50 per cent of the real number of people out of employment.

Mr. WOOD. The figures which were furnished were gathered by the Labor Department's employees all over this country, and those who disputed those figures jumped at a conclusion by reason of statements in the public press which were without any authority whatever. I have faith in the Labor Department's statistics in this regard, for it is their business to gather those statistics. If they are not doing it properly we should know that, and if their figures are not worth while we should not keep on appropriating more money for doing this job. So I say it strikes me that this only adds an additional burden and that it can be of no good use. In addition, it will entail additional expense for no good purpose whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. How would a retired farmer or a retired business man be classified under this provision?

Mr. WOOD. That would depend largely on the judgment of the enumerator. I want to say to you that the information obtained by reason of the fact that you are going to leave this thing to Tom, Dick, and Harry will not be worth the paper it is written on, while the facts that are gathered by the Labor Department, whose business it is to gather these facts, are of some real value, because that department sends out its experts for the purpose of ascertaining these facts. So I hope this amendment will prevail.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. There are two kinds of unemployment, voluntary unemployment and involuntary unemployment, and if we are to have a census of unemployment it should be a census of enforced unemployment, ought it not?

Mr. WOOD. I agree with the gentleman. We now have 10 per cent of our entire population that will not work under any circumstances.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. How many of them are in the district represented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]?

Mr. WOOD. I have not had a census taken of Brother LAGUARDIA's district.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I can well understand that the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee and the distinguished gentleman from Indiana do not want to get any facts on unemployment. They are two of the shrewdest manipulators the Republican Party has. I can particularly understand that with respect to the gentleman from Indiana, because he is probably the best free-for-all, catch-as-catch-can political orator in the country and he does not want to be disturbed by facts, facts furnished by the Labor Department or anybody else. He wants to make his own facts in a political campaign and he sees the danger to the Republican Party in getting an enumeration as to employment conditions. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAGUARDIA) there were—ayes 104, noes 57.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TINKHAM offers the following amendment to section 1: Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "and," and after the word "mines" insert a comma and the following: "and the number of inhabitants in each State being 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, whose right to vote at the election next preceding such census for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, has been denied or abridged except for rebellion or other crime."

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman care to discuss the point of order?

Mr. RANKIN. It has been discussed before, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CHINDBLOM). The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

We are now considering the portion of the bill which relates to the census, and for all practical purposes section 1 is a part of a census bill. That section provides for the taking of a census making enumeration for the purpose of statistical information on a number of different subjects. The original text included population, agriculture, irrigation, drainage, distribution, unemployment, radio sets, and mines, and the action of the committee has already added another item relating to the enumeration of aliens in the United States. At this point in the bill, the Chair believes the amendment to be in order, on the theory which is well known to the membership of the House that where a large number of objects are enumerated, other objects relating to the same general subject matter may be added as being germane to the text.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, it has been repeatedly stated that this bill is both a census and an apportionment bill; that it is based upon the second section of the first article of the Constitution, which requires a census every 10 years, and upon the fourteenth amendment, which requires apportionment of the membership of this House, including the mandatory part of that amendment which requires a reduction of the membership in proportion to disfranchisement.

Therefore, to be constitutional this bill must contain these three provisions: (1) To take a census of population; (2) to make the apportionment, which is provided for by devolving the duty to make the apportionment upon the Director of the Census after fixing the number of Representatives at 435; and (3) to provide, in accordance with the mandatory section of the fourteenth amendment, for the reduction of representation in proportion to disfranchisement.

If any one of these three essential provisions should be omitted from this bill, the bill is plainly unconstitutional. Should we omit the taking of population it certainly would be unconstitutional; should we omit the apportionment, it certainly would be unconstitutional; and if we should omit reduction of representation in proportion to disfranchisement, it certainly would be unconstitutional.

Therefore I am asking only that this bill be made constitutional, and I wish to say to this committee that unless the bill is made constitutional by providing that statistics shall be obtained in the ordinary and usual manner by the Bureau of the Census upon which is devolved the responsibility of obtaining such information, I wish to hear no more about constitutional enforcement in this House. [Applause.] I wish to hear no more about law enforcement in this House. I wish to hear no more about nullification in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. In just a moment.

I say that if this amendment is not adopted, to provide for the carrying out of the fourteenth amendment in its full intent and purpose, this House is a House of hypocrites, of nullifiers, and of men wholly lawless. [Laughter and applause.] This House is a House that does not believe either in the Constitution or in law. It does not believe that this body should be organized in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution. It believes that men should sit here unconstitutionally making laws. The amendment goes to the very root of government in this country, because it is the number of Members in this House that determines the number of electors who choose our President. Without following the dictates of the Constitution in this particular by adopting an amendment looking to the reduction of representation in proportion to disfranchisement by the obtaining of the necessary statistics we continue to elect our President unconstitutionally. We are a de facto Government and not a de jure Government.

I wish to say to the Members on both sides who talk, and talk incessantly, about the enforcement of laws and about following the Constitution, that it is their duty, not only as honest men, but in allegiance to the oath they take every two years to sustain and support the Constitution to adopt this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAGUARDIA) there were—ayes 94, noes 103.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. TINKHAM and Mr. RANKIN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 109 ayes and 122 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the Bankhead amendment insert the following: "In taking such census the Director of the Census shall cause to be registered the names and addresses of all persons 21 years of age and over who desire that the prohibition law be modified to permit the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer, as well as the names and addresses of all persons 21 years of age and over who are opposed to such modification of the prohibition law."

Mr. BANKHEAD. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not within the province of the Chair to pass on the policy of an amendment; the only question before the Chair is whether the amendment is germane. It seems to the Chair, as a matter of enumeration and statistics, that it is germane, in view of the large number of subjects mentioned in the section, and the point of order is overruled.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, this census will be taken in order to obtain statistics which will be of value for use by the various branches of the Government. The tragic reports appearing each day in the press indicate that one of the biggest questions before the American people is that of prohibition. The adoption of this amendment will obtain first-hand statistics which will be of value to the commission appointed by the President of the United States to study crime and the law-enforcement problem, as well as to Congress and all of the American people.

This amendment should be supported not only by those who have been advocating modification of the existing prohibition law but also by the most ardent, rabid prohibitionists. [Applause.]

The prohibitionists have repeatedly told us that the American people do not desire anything but the one-half of 1 per cent provided under the Volstead Act. In defense of such statements they refer to results of elections where a multitude of issues are involved. Dry leaders in the House of Representatives even had the audacity to claim that the last presidential election indicated that the people favored the existing prohibition laws. In a referendum in the fall of 1926 the Wisconsin voters indicated that they favored a modification of the Volstead Act by an overwhelming majority.

President Hoover received a majority in Wisconsin last fall of nearly a hundred thousand. This spring the sovereign voters of Wisconsin in a referendum voted in favor of repealing the State prohibition law by a majority of over 150,000. No one can truthfully state that a congressional or presidential election, where many issues are involved, will indicate that the people favor the prohibition laws.

I call upon those who continually tell us on the floor of this House that the American people want no more than one-half of 1 per cent and are perfectly satisfied with the present prohibition law to let us get the facts under the next census.

No prohibitionist should hesitate about voting for my amendment, which would determine the facts, unless he is fearful that the majority of the people are opposed to the existing prohibition law.

I ask you to pause and reflect and support this amendment, so that the people of America can indicate their position on this very important question. [Applause.]

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin) there were 42 ayes and 136 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "distribution," insert the words "men and women of 65 years or more who are in needy circumstances."

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the equivalent of that amendment, almost the identical verbiage, has been passed upon by the House and defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair thinks that this is quite essentially different from the other amendment.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING] offered an amendment somewhat the same as this amendment, to take a census of the needy aged, but it was not as specific as my amendment. Just a few minutes ago the committee struck out the unemployment census, because the Labor Department takes a monthly census of unemployment. No department of the Government takes any census of our aged poor. We are to-day the greatest industrial country in the world, yet we are the only civilized country in the world which does not look after our aged and destitute men and women. The amendment that I have offered does not cost the Government any money. It simply provides for a census of a serious condition that we all know exists. Many of us who are Members of Congress fail to realize the hardships of wage earners over 50 years of age who have been thrown out on the industrial scrap heap, because Members of Congress, politicians, business, or professional men often do their best work after they attain the age of 50 or 60 years, where maturity of judgment and ripened experience are a distinct advantage. But that is not the case of the man or woman who works in a factory and is thrown out on the scrap heap at 45 years or 50 years of age, due to the high-pressure and superefficiency methods in our industrial plants. We have become a great industrial country within the last 20 years, and people from the farms are swarming into the cities and taking part in our mass production. The age line for employment is being steadily lowered, and the wage earner of 50 is unable to keep the pace or maintain his job.

The time has come when we should cease doing the ostrich act and confront, or at least attempt to solve, this serious problem of old-age dependency and vote intelligently, at least to make a survey of the condition that we all know exists in this country. Therefore I have taken this opportunity to offer an amendment for the purposes of obtaining a census or survey of our men and women of 65 and above who are in needy circumstances. I hope the Members of the House will realize the necessity of such a census at the present time, as we can make it under the provisions of this bill at little cost, instead of coming back next year or the year after and asking for a survey at great expense to the Government. It is a condition that confronts us, and not a theory. It is a fact that we are facing, and I appeal to the Members of the House to support the amendment, which does not commit us to old-age pensions, but at least shows our willingness to find out the facts. Every nation in the world, except China, India, and the United States, has some constructive system of financial relief for their aged poor. All we offer is the wretched confines of a poorhouse for our aged and destitute men and women who have built up our great wealth and prosperity through long years of toil.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Would the gentleman indicate to what use this information probably would be put, in his judgment?

Mr. FISH. Exactly—for the purpose of framing legislation, or at least to have the facts and figures to base legislation on. No one in this House knows whether it is constitutional or not to enact a Federal old-age pension law. A dozen States already have enacted such laws, but, in order to get the facts to work on, so that a committee of this House or a committee of the other body can work intelligently and frame constructive legislation to afford relief to the aged poor of the country, I contend we should provide for such a census in this bill.

We have a paradox in the United States, the richest country in the world, in that our wage earners are left alone, to worry and suffer the humiliations of poverty in their declining years. Millions of American men and women with families to support are actually earning wages insufficient to maintain our high American standard of living, and consequently are totally unable to save funds in order to provide security for their old age.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Does the gentleman have any judgment or opinion as to whether or not such legislation would be constitutional, if enacted?

Mr. FISH. I have not. I have offered a resolution which is now pending before the Committee on Rules asking for the appointment of a committee of five by the Speaker to make a thorough investigation of the old age pension laws of European countries and of the States for the purpose of finding out whether Federal legislation is required, and to find out, primarily, whether such a law will be constitutional. But we must have sufficient information on which to base it; we must find out how many aged poor there are; and if this does no good as far as the Federal Government is concerned, at least it will help the States in framing State legislation. I am frank to say that I favor State legislation in preference to a Federal system of old age pension laws. [Applause.]

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FISH) there were—ayes 78, noes 109.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the period of three years beginning the 1st day of July next preceding the census provided for in section 1 of this act shall be known as the decennial census period, and the reports upon the inquiries provided for in said section shall be completed within such period: Provided, That the tabulation of total population by States as required for the apportionment of Representatives shall be completed within 12 months and reported by the Director of the Census to the Secretary of Commerce and by him to the President of the United States.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McLEOD: Page 2, line 12, after the word "months," insert the words "after the beginning of the above-prescribed period."

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The section already provides for exactly what the amendment proposes. Why encumber it with this extra verbiage? I make the point of order that it is duplication.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no rule of the House under which duplication is subject to the point of order as far as the Chair is aware. Unless the amendment violates one of the specific rules of the House, the Chair is not empowered to rule it out of order. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the McLeod amendment.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, may I have the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD] for a moment? I would like to get some explanation of this amendment.

Mr. McLEOD. It is inserted for the purpose of perfecting the language.

Mr. HOCH. In what way does it perfect the language?

Mr. McLEOD. It specifies definitely the period when the decennial census starts.

Mr. HOCH. According to this section the decennial period begins on the 1st day of July, 1929.

Mr. McLEOD. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. That would mean that you would have to report a tabulation by the 1st day of July, 1930.

Mr. McLEOD. It shall be completed within 12 months, but the language is, "beginning the 1st day of July."

Mr. HOCH. That would mean that you would have to report the tabulation within two months from the time you started to take the census.

Mr. McLEOD. All I do here is to qualify when that date begins.

Mr. HOCH. When does it begin?

Mr. McLEOD. As before stated, just as the amendment reads.

Mr. HOCH. That would be the 1st of July, 1929.

Mr. McLEOD. It is all right without it, but it is perfecting language.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman does not make it clear to me. As I understand, this language means that it must begin on the 1st of July, which will be the 1st day of July, 1929. Is that correct?

Mr. McLEOD. Yes. That is the way I read it.

Mr. HOCH. Now, you do not propose to start taking the census until May, 1930. Your amendment provides that he must report the tabulation within 12 months from the beginning of the period, and therefore you would have to make the report by the 1st of July, 1930. In other words, you would have to report the tabulation within two months after you started.

Mr. McLEOD. When would you start taking the census, according to the language now?

Mr. HOCH. I am trying to get the effect of the gentleman's amendment. Is the effect of the gentleman's amendment to require a report of the tabulation within two months after starting to take the census?

Mr. McLEOD. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. Does the gentleman think that is possible, to make a report on the population within two months after starting to take the census?

Mr. BURTNESS. Is that not the effect of the language in the bill?

Mr. HOCH. No. Under the bill the census would be started on the 1st day of November preceding. Now, you propose to start it on the 1st of May. It is impracticable to make the report of the population within two months after starting to take the census. The gentleman's proposal would make the report impossible and there could be no apportionment.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. The gentleman from Kansas is entirely right in this matter. When you change the year of taking the census you should also change the paragraph in section 2.

Mr. HOCH. I do not see how it is possible to make a report on the tabulation within two months after you start taking the census.

Mr. McLEOD. I think the gentleman is correct. I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HOCH. You can not cure the trouble by that action alone. This language must be changed.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kansas yield before he sits down?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD] and the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] to the fact that the trouble is not cured by withdrawing the amendment. The vice is in the section as it stands.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I hesitate, without time to consider the matter fully, to offer an amendment providing what the language should be; but I think the committee, before we pass this section, should offer an amendment to perfect this section, because we have an impossible phraseology now, and one which would defeat all apportionment.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. No committee changes have been from 1930 to 1929.

Mr. HOCH. But the committee has already announced its intention of changing "November" to "May," so that it will be "May, 1930."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's statement is very pertinent. The committee should revert to this section after the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this section may be passed over and returned to later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to pass this section over and return to it later for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. LOZIER. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—this section presents a very delicate problem, and it is going to take considerable time to rewrite section 2. For that reason I think we should pass it over for the time being.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I am willing that the section be passed over by unanimous consent, with the right to return for the purpose of considering a committee amendment to correct it. But I am not willing to let the section go wide open. I am willing to pass it over, but only for the purpose of curing this defect.

Mr. HOCH. I am perfectly willing to modify my request in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this section be passed over, with permission to return to it later for the purpose of correcting the matter of the time, as set forth in line 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that this section may be passed over and taken up later for the purpose of considering amendments relative to the period of time referred to on page 2. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, may I have the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH]? I think the gentleman's request is all right as modified, except that he also ought to include in it line 6, in which the word "July" is used, because in my opinion it is possibly necessary to make that "January."

Mr. HOCH. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to modify the request as suggested to include line 6.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I object. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York objects and moves to strike out the last word. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to something that is not controversial. If we go to the next section I think the temper of the House will be such as to appreciate what I want to say.

Just 10 years ago to-day, on June 4, 1919, the United States Senate, by a vote of 56 to 25, a quorum being present and two-thirds of the Senators having voted in the affirmative, passed the resolution calling for a constitutional amendment providing for equal suffrage to women to be ratified by three-fourths of the States. [Applause.]

The same resolution previously passed the House of Representatives on May 21, 1919, by a vote of 304 to 90.

The question of woman suffrage had been at issue for many years. The first resolution, known as the "Susan B. Anthony amendment," was introduced in the United States Senate by Senator Sargent, of California, in January of 1878. It was voted on in the Senate four times. In 1887 the vote was 17 yeas and 34 nays; in 1914 it failed by 11 votes; in 1918 it failed by 2 votes; in February, 1919, it failed again by 1 vote. In the House of Representatives it was voted on in 1915 for the first time, failing by 78 of the necessary two-thirds vote. On January 10, 1918, it passed the House of Representatives by 1 vote over the necessary two-thirds majority. The speaker takes peculiar pride in this vote of the House of Representatives. At that time he was in the Army and in service overseas. He cabled his pair to Speaker Champ Clark of the House of Representatives, thus taking away one active, live opposition vote and thereby contributing one-half to the one vote which passed the resolution for the first time in the House.

At the time that Congress passed the resolution women enjoyed equal and full franchise privileges in 28 States of the Union. The first State to grant women full and equal suffrage was Wyoming, as early as 1869. It was followed by Colorado in 1893. The last State which granted woman suffrage prior to the ratification of the constitutional amendment was Missouri, in 1919. The foreign countries which accorded full suffrage to women prior to the time this privilege was granted to all women of the United States were the Isle of Man, New Zealand, Australia, Finland, Norway, Iceland, Denmark, Russia, Canada, Austria, Czechoslovakia, England, Germany, Hungary, Ireland, Poland, Scotland, Wales, Holland, and Sweden.

The nineteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which enfranchised women throughout the Union, though of far-reaching effect, is very short and simple in its language. It reads:

> The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.
> Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

It followed practically the wording of the original amendment drafted by Susan B. Anthony in 1875, which read:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

After the resolution had been passed by Congress it quickly received the necessary approval of the required three-fourths of the States. The first State to ratify the amendment was Illinois on June 10, 1919, just six days after its passage by Congress. The required thirty-sixth State was Tennessee on August 24, 1920. The remarkable fight put up by the great suffrage leaders of the country in the State of Tennessee is still fresh in the memory of all those who took part in the many years of struggle to grant equal rights to the women of America. The amendment, duly ratified, became part of the Constitution of the United States by proclamation of the Secretary of State on August 26, 1920, just two days after it had been ratified by the thirty-sixth State. Thereafter it was ratified by the States of Connecticut, September 14, 1920, and Vermont on February 8, 1921, making a total of 38 States which affirmatively approved of the constitutional amendment. The States of Alabama, Virginia, and Maryland rejected the amendment. This left seven States, all of which did not take any action primarily by reason that their legislatures were not in session and the amendment having been duly ratified action later was no longer necessary. These seven States were all in favor of the amendment.

It can safely be said that no amendment added to the Constitution since its adoption was of more far-reaching and beneficial effect. No good, wholesome reason could ever be presented to justify denying, in a republic and a representative government, the vote to the women. [Applause.] The wonder is that it took so many years to bring it about. The intelligent participation of women in American politics during the 10 years of universal suffrage is the complete answer to every criticism and opposition raised against the proposition. The vote of the women throughout the country has had a great tendency to cleanse politics. [Applause.] Their vote is a great deal responsible for abolishing the old-type political boss. The women have shown a greater degree of independence than the men. Many of the old-style tactics practiced in several States have been abandoned since the doors of the polls were opened to women.

Better labor laws, school facilities, welfare measures, health, and home legislation naturally attract the woman voter, and it is safe to say that in the States where women had the vote the most progressive legislation on these subjects was enacted. Since women have had the vote throughout the country measures of these characters have found a place in the platform of all political parties.

Let us pause to pay tribute to Susan B. Anthony and Lucretia Mott, and with them the courageous and faithful pioneers of 1875 and their equally courageous, effective, and efficient successors who fought the battle and won. [Applause.]

We all recall the first woman who graced this House, the efficient, progressive, able gentlewoman from Montana, Jeanette Rankin. She was followed by the gentlewoman from Oklahoma, Alice Robertson. Then came the gentlewoman from California, who replaced her splendid and fine husband, James Nolan. I refer to Mrs. May Nolan, from California. We now have gracing this House and contributing to the making of legislation and to the thought of the country our able colleagues, every one of them a credit not only to her sex but to her State and country, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts, Mrs. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS; Mrs. CATHERINE LANGLEY, of Kentucky; Mrs. MARY NORTON, of New Jersey; Mrs. FLORENCE KAHN, of California: Mrs. PEARL P. OLDFIELD, of Arkansas; Mrs. RUTH HANNA McCORMICK, of Illinois; Mrs. RUTH BRYAN OWEN, of Florida; and Mrs. RUTH PRATT, of New York. By the example that they have given, by the splendid work that they perform, and by the great public service which they render they have created the hope that we will have many more such gentlewomen in the House in the future. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 2, line 12, strike out the word "twelve" and insert the word "eighteen." I will say I do that for this reason: The date fixed in the bill for the taking of the census was the 1st of November. You now propose to move the date ahead six months, from November 1 to May 1, so, in order to cure that, I have simply added 6 months to the 12 months.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. If the gentleman will change the word "July," in line 6, to "January," he will accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. HOCH. I assumed the committee had some reason for fixing the 1st of July.

Mr. FENN. This date was not fixed by the House committee but by another body.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOCH: Page 2, line 12, strike out the word "twelve" and insert the word "eighteen."

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, if the committee desires to change the 1st of July to the 1st of January, then that would accomplish the same thing, but I assumed the committee was in favor of the 1st of July. If the committee desires the 1st of January that would cure this defect, as I see it, and would amount to the same thing. I am simply trying to make this section workable.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. My attitude toward this bill is well known. I favor some parts of it and oppose certain of its provisions, but if this legislation is enacted certainly it ought to be in a workable form. Now, you are considering a proposition involved in section 2 that is correlated with and tied to another section and another date in a subsequent portion of this bill, and if we pass this bill it ought to be in a workable form and its provisions should be consistent and in harmony with each other. I call the attention of the membership of the House to the provision in section 22 and to the date when the certificate required by said section 22 must be sent to Congress. You are going to get your dates tangled and incorporate in this bill impossible or at least conflicting or contradictory dates.

Now, if you are not careful you are going to tangle up this situation and get a number of irreconcilable provisions. For this reason I think this section should be passed for the present, and I hope the gentleman from Kansas will renew his request to postpone consideration of this section for the present. Having as a member of the Census Committee given this matter a great deal of consideration, I trust there will be no objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas that this matter may be passed for the present.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and renew my previous request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment he offered a moment ago. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that section 2 may be passed for further consideration later during the consideration of the bill in the Committee of the Whole with reference to the periods of time fixed therein. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That there may be employed in the Bureau of the Census, in addition to the force provided for by the appropriation act for the fiscal year immediately preceding the decennial census period, two assistant directors, one of whom shall act as executive assistant to the director, performing, in addition, the duties usually assigned to the chief clerk, and the other, who must be a person of known and tried experience in statistical work, as technical and statistical advisor; these officials to be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce, upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census, in conformity with the civil service laws and rules.

In addition to the force hereinbefore provided for, there may be appointed by the Director of the Census, without regard to the provisions of the classification act, for any period not extending beyond the decennial census period, at rates of compensation to be fixed by him, but not exceeding the compensation received by other civil-service employees engaged in like or comparable service, as many temporary employees in the District of Columbia as may be necessary to meet the requirements of the work: Provided, That census employees who may be transferred to any such temporary positions shall not lose their permanent civil-service status by reason of such transfer: Provided further, That hereafter in making appointments to clerical and other positions in the executive branch of the Government in the District of Columbia or elsewhere preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and widows of such, and to the wives of injured soldiers, sailors, and marines, who themselves are not qualified, but whose wives are qualified, to hold such positions: Provided further, That all such temporary appointments shall be made in conformity with the civil service laws and rules: Provided further, That in the selection of the force necessary to the taking of the census, preference shall be given to American citizens and/or ex-service men and women.

That special agents, supervisors, supervisors' clerks, enumerators, and interpreters may be appointed by the Director of the Census to carry out the provisions of this act and of the act to provide for a permanent Census Office, approved March 6, 1902, and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, such appointments to be made subject to the civil service laws but without regard to the classification act of 1923, as amended, and without giving the appointees under this provision a status for transfer to other positions, and direct preference shall be given to the disabled veterans of wars in which the United States has been engaged. The Director of the Census may delegate to the supervisors authority to appoint enumerators. The enlisted men and officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps may be appointed and compensated for the enumeration of Army, Navy, Marine, and other military posts. Employees of the Department of Commerce and other departments and independent offices of the Government may, with the consent of the head of the respective department or office, be employed and compensated for field work in connection with the Fifteenth Decennial Census, but, when so employed, shall not be paid in the aggregate greater compensation than they would receive for service in the positions held by them. The special agents, supervisors, supervisors' clerks, enumerators, and interpreters thus appointed shall receive compensation at rates to be fixed by the Director of the Census: Provided, That special agents appointed at a per diem rate shall not be paid in excess of $8 per diem except as hereinafter provided; and that the compensation on a piece-price basis may be fixed without limitation as to the amount earned per diem: Provided further, That during the decennial census period the Director of the Census may fix the compensation of not to exceed 25 special agents at an amount not to exceed $12 per diem: Provided further, That permanent employees of the Census Office and special agents may be detailed, when necessary, to act as supervisors or enumerators, such permanent employees and special agents to have like authority with and perform the same duties as the supervisors or enumerators in respect to the subjects committed to them under this act.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FENN: Page 3, lines 5, 6, and 7, after the word "him," strike out "but not exceeding the compensation received by other civil-service employees engaged in like or comparable service."

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment authorizes the Census Bureau in its employment to pay added compensation to men in the service connected with the Indian agents, Forest Service, Bureau of Fisheries, Army officers or men in camps, superintendents of public parks, rural mail carriers, and other Federal employees who are familiar with local conditions. They feel it would be absolutely impossible to get these men to serve unless they did receive some additional compensation, and it seems to me, as well as to the bureau, that they should be allowed to receive compensation for the work they do, and I trust the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: On page 4, lines 7 to 12, inclusive, strike out the words "subject to the civil service laws but without regard to the classification act of 1923, as amended, and without giving the appointees under this provision a status for transfer to other positions, and direct preference shall be given to the disabled veterans of wars in which the United States has been engaged," and insert in lieu thereof "without reference to the civil service or the classification acts."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment is to restore to the bill the language it contained when it passed this House in the last Congress and the language it contained when it was reported by the committee in the Senate.

The language to be stricken out is language inserted by way of amendment in the Senate and the language which I move to restore is the language that had been carried in the bill up to the time of such amendment.

Mr. GREEN. That eliminates the civil-service feature, does it not?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It simply eliminates in the appointment of the temporary field forces, a large number of whom are the enumerators, any civil-service provision or qualification.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. What is the objection to applying the civil-service requirement?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The objection is this. I think this House is aware of the fact that for the 10 years I have been chairman of the Committee on the Civil Service, I have been a consistent supporter of the merit system and the civil-service system; that I and my committee have been diligent in seeking the development and the maintenance of an intelligent employment policy by the Government, but it is absolutely unworkable and impracticable to apply the civil-service system to 95,000 positions that are to be filled and function in a specific manner for two weeks. I am a believer in civil service, but I am not a fool. [Applause.]

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman's amendment cure the first proviso which says that all such temporary appointments shall be made in conformity with the civil service laws and rules?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It is not intended to touch that at all. Those are appointments to be made here in the Department of Commerce, in the Bureau of the Census, and those people are to function for three years under such appointment and they ought to be under the civil service, but the field force ought not to be under the civil service.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I am in entire sympathy, so far as the elimination of civil service is concerned, but why does the gentleman strike out the language "and direct preference shall be given to the disabled veterans of wars in which the United States has been engaged"?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Because that is already in the law and was only put in the Senate amendment for good measure. It is not only the law but it has been specifically strengthened by recent Executive order, as the gentleman well knows. This language serves no useful purpose here. I was discussing it with the Civil Service Commission and nobody knows, not even its introducer, what the word "direct" means in saying that direct preference shall be given to the disabled veterans when everybody knows they have preference now.

Mr. FISH. That is only with respect to the civil service.

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; it is not. It is with respect to any civilian position whether it is in the classified service or not.

Mr. FISH. Well, it is not carried out.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Are these positions going to come under that provision of law?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Certainly. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

If I understand the amendment it means that the various enumerators and all employees engaged in the work will be appointed by the Republicans without examination, and possibly with no peculiar fitness for the office.

I am sure a number of my colleagues on this side are receiving letters every day just as I am asking them to indorse persons for these appointments. I am sure the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle are receiving similar letters. If this work is placed under the civil service then employees who merit employment and who are able to perform their duties, may be selected.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. How many of these enumerators will want to take a civil-service examination and bother with it for two weeks' employment?

Mr. GREEN. Doubtless some of them will not want to take an examination. I do not think they would want to take an examination, because they could receive appointments without it and that is just the meat of the nut. If the Republicans make all the appointments and examinations are not held, no Democrats get a position. My Democratic constituents are capable and qualified to do this work and I want them to share in it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, lines 22, 23, and 24, strike out the following: "but when so employed shall not be paid in the aggregate greater compensation than they would receive for service in the position held by them" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and when so employed shall not be subject to the provisions of section 1765 of the Revised Statutes or to the act of May 10, 1916, and August 29, 1916, Thirty-ninth Statute, page 120, section 6, and page 580, section 6."

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered at the suggestion of the committee. The sections of the bill passed last year carried this same provision. The reason for it is this: In the island possessions, Guam, the Virgin Islands, Samoa, and other outlying portions of the country, in Alaska the officials in the Census Bureau report that they are unable to obtain civilian employees in the Territory mentioned, and are required to appoint persons in the military or naval service. The Revised Statutes contains a prohibition against the employment of persons in the Army and Navy—in the Naval Reserves and National Guard. This amendment would clarify the situation so that in the discretion of the Director of the Census persons in the Army and Navy, the Organized Reserves, and the National Guard might be employed in this respect. This was the same provision contained in the bill as it passed the House at the last session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUCE: Page 3, beginning with line 22, strike out the proviso to the end of line 25.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I take it that this is an illustration of what sometimes happens when amendments are inserted from the floor in any legislative body without having been considered by a committee. On page 4, beginning with line 12, down to line 13, the proviso beginning "Provided further, That hereafter" is an exact quotation from existing law, as it may be found in the Code, title 5, section 35. Why under the sun there should be any necessity for repeating existing law I can not see. You will notice in the existing law preference is to be given "to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and widows of such, and to the wives of injured soldiers, sailors, and marines, who themselves are not qualified but whose wives are qualified, to hold such positions." You will notice that the last proviso on the page says that preference shall be given to "ex-service men and women," saying nothing about widows or the wives of disabled veterans. How these differing phrases are going to be reconciled I can not understand. Inasmuch as the proviso set forth in lines 13 to 20 is existing law, I have as to its substance no occasion for opposing its repetition here, but inasmuch as the existing law seems already to handle the matter of preference adequately, and the last proviso on the page is both superfluous and confusing, it strikes me as prudent for it to be omitted.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it not a fact that the provision to which the gentleman refers as being in the present law has reference only to those in the classified civil service, and as these employees are not to be of that service, in order to give them that preference is it not necessary?

Mr. LUCE. I had so understood it. I may be in error, but my study of the situation did not disclose that to be the fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the language in the proviso beginning in line 12 and down to line 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUCE: Page 3, beginning in line 12, strike out the proviso, ending in line 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington) there were—ayes 114, noes 14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 4, at the end of the amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH, add: "but preference shall be given to disabled veterans of wars in which the United States has been engaged and wives of disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines who themselves are not qualified, but whose wives are qualified for appointment."

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is to take care of the disabled service men or their wives in case the disabled soldiers are not able to qualify for these appointments themselves. We have done everything that the Government has been called upon to do in the way of compensation, hospitalization, and rehabilitation for the veterans, but we have been derelict in providing jobs for the disabled soldiers of all our wars. We have a very low percentage of disabled veterans employed in the Government service, the reason being that no one heretofore has made any special effort to amend the civil service laws or to provide in laws of this kind that preference shall be given to the disabled. The situation is this: A man without a leg who gets $40 from the Government to support himself and his family we will say goes to Henry Ford and asks for a job. Mr. Ford or his representative tells the disabled veteran—

We have the utmost sympathy for you, and if you had been injured in our service we would take care of you, but the Government should provide a job for you.

If a disabled veteran without an arm goes to the General Electric Co. and asks for a job he is told the same sad story. The result is that those people who have been badly injured, who have lost a leg or an arm, or who have been otherwise seriously injured in the war, find that they can not compete with the able-bodied, and on the other hand they are not provided with jobs either by the Government or by private industry.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. Is not the very language the gentleman is proposing here in the main the language the gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out?

Mr. FISH. No; that refers to the able-bodied. This is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. If I can get more time. I have some information that I would like to present at this time. I was chairman of the President's advisory committee on veterans' preference, and believe that now, 10 years after the armistice, we have an opportunity to keep faith with our disabled veterans by granting them preference in this bill. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I listened to the reading of the amendment it provided that disabled veterans of the wars in which the United States has been engaged shall be given a preference. That would give a preference to a disabled veteran of the German Army.

Mr. FISH. Oh, no; that is the customary language. Of course, this is only for American citizens. That has already been provided for. I am willing to accept any amendment in order to clarify the purpose of my amendment.

The situation is this: If you go down to the National Museum here in Washington you will find two or three disabled veterans employed out of some 200 guards. If you go to the Museum of the Louvre, in Paris, you will find 95 per cent of the employees there are disabled soldiers of France. The same thing applies to every government building throughout Germany, England, Belgium, Italy, and France. We have a very small percentage of disabled men in the Government service here. We have an opportunity now to give preference to the disabled soldiers under this bill so that the enumerators and others, when you come to appoint them, may be appointed from that class. If you believe in giving preference to the disabled, vote for this amendment, and if you do not believe in the promises and pledges we gave before and during the war, then you should vote it down. The fact is, and it can not be denied, that we have not fulfilled our pledges toward the disabled, we have not until the Executive order of March 2, 1929, provided actual preference for civil-service positions in the Government service. Under the civil-service ruling of March 2 the disabled are put at the head of the preference list. Certainly we ought to afford them or their wives preference, although not under civil service, as far as selecting enumerators is concerned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. All we care to know is where is the distinction between this language and the language that is stricken out? Is not this covered by the law?

Mr. FISH. No.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it is not covered by the law, we are ready to vote.

Mr. FISH. It is not covered by the law at all. The other provision applied to the able bodied. Twenty-five per cent of all jobs under the civil service in the United States are held to-day by the able-bodied veterans. I am talking about the disabled veterans and hope my amendment will prevail, as it will benefit those who most need our help and will be a further step in carrying out the promises and pledges of the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to direct a question to the gentleman who has just left the floor, Mr. FISH. If the language embodied in his amendment is adopted, will it then be possible for a veteran whose only disability is the result of his own misconduct to obtain a preference? Does the gentleman's amendment go so far as to include disabilities of all kinds? If a man was wounded in "the Battle of Paris" or some of those places around the camps, due to his own misconduct, would this amendment give him a preference?

Mr. FISH. It implies war origin only under the construction of the word "disability" as used by the Veterans' Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOYLAN: Page 5, line 3, after the word "of," strike out the sign and figure "$8" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$12."

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the House, after striking out the civil-service qualification for enumerators, and now that the boys are going to get a little bit of "pork," we ought to give them something worth while.

The skilled laborers in the large cities are now compensated at the rate of $12 a day. If you are going to put the census enumerator in at $8 you would pay him less than you would pay a skilled laborer. Surely you are not going to ask the boys to work for $8 per day when a laborer is getting $12 per day; and I think in all fairness to those who are put on the pay roll we ought to say that the Congress at least stands for a living wage, because in these days of high tariff, where you only add $500,000,000 annually to the household budget of the country, we ought to pay proper compensation to Government employees.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Do you not think you ought to give them a pension?

Mr. BOYLAN. That will be a subject for later consideration. I have always held that it is really a mistake the way we treat our Federal employees. We have men and women here working in the city of Washington and in other cities for ridiculously small wages, wages that are away out of line with those paid to employees in private business. So when we are starting off, especially in this era of unemployment, let the Government show that it at least will set an example to the employers of this country and pay a living wage.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BOYLAN. Certainly.

Mr. COLE. This would not apply to enumerators. It would apply only to special agents.

Mr. BOYLAN. Well, if I said "enumerators" I meant special agents. The special agent should get more than $12. [Laughter.] But if the gentleman wants to compensate them at $4 or $6 or $8, that is not an adequate or proper compensation for the high order of intelligence needed for those who take the census of the inhabitants of this country. I hope gentlemen will vote for this meritorious amendment, which provides for a living wage. [Applause.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I have taken the floor to say something which I think ought to be said. For a number of years I have been a member of the Committee on the Census, and I have had an opportunity of coming into contact with the Bureau of the Census, particularly with Doctor Steuart, the director, and Doctor Hill, the assistant director, and their associates. I have a profound respect for the Bureau of the Census and for the men who are at the head of that important governmental agency.

My contact with the Bureau of the Census has convinced me that it is one of the most efficient bureaus and governmental activities that we have. I do not recall that there has ever been a scandal connected with the management of the Bureau of the Census. Beginning with the Ninth Census in 1870, when that great man, Francis A. Walker, was the Director or Superintendent of the Census, and coming down to the present, to the director, Doctor Steuart, the business of that bureau has been conducted along nonpartisan, nonpolitical, and business lines, and it has made a very creditable record for efficiency. It gives me pleasure from my contact with the Census Bureau to certify to its efficiency under the present management of Doctor Steuart, Doctor Hill, and their associates. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 110.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire whether all following the proviso, in line 22, page 3, has been stricken out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is under the impression it has been stricken out.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOYLAN: On page 5, in line 9, after the word "exceed," strike out the sign and figures "$12" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$15."

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to keep the House any longer than to say that the $3 extra per day applies to 25 special agents. You men say you want to help the disabled soldier and his widow, and yet you want to pay them a petty-larceny wage. If you are going to help them, help them in a good and liberal manner; do not pay them a miserable pittance, on which they can not properly exist.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOYLAN) there were—ayes 15, noes 112.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 2 for the purpose of inserting perfecting amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to return to section 2 for the purpose of considering it under the unanimous-consent agreement made a little while ago. Is there objection?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, let me ask my colleague if he does not think it would be well to wait until after we have disposed of section 6.

Mr. McLEOD. I do not, for the reason that we can not dispose of section 6 with the same information that we might have if these amendments are adopted.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I am going to ask the gentleman from Michigan to withhold that for the time being. The chances are we will not finish the bill to-night, and if we do not, I would like to carry this amendment over until to-morrow, as several gentlemen want to investigate it. I have had no opportunity to consult the other members of the committee on this side.

Mr. McLEOD. The only reason we are going back to it at this time is because we could not properly consider section 6 without knowing what section 2 will be. Therefore you could not act on section 6 intelligently.

The CHAIRMAN. All of this is by unanimous consent.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, there was an agreement made to return to this section. Unanimous consent was granted by the committee to pass this section for the purpose of giving the committee an opportunity to prepare perfecting amendments, so that unanimous consent is not necessary to return to that section.

Mr. RANKIN. Unanimous consent is certainly necessary in order to return to it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not at all, because that consent has already been granted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there was no time fixed for returning to the section, and under ordinary practice the Chair thinks the gentleman who is acting in control of the bill under the rule, as if the committee had been organized and he were chairman of it, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FENN] would be entitled to recognition to move to return to the section.

Mr. RANKIN. Do I understand the gentleman from Connecticut is asking to return to this section?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Connecticut now asks to return to that section, the Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Connecticut is within his rights under the agreement heretofore made.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Connecticut makes that request.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, let me say to the gentleman from Connecticut that I have had no opportunity to discuss this proposition with other members of the committee on this side.

Mr. FENN. I must insist.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FENN——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is mistaken. The amendment is offered by the gentleman from Michigan in behalf of the gentleman from Connecticut.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McLEOD: On page 2, strike out line 6 and all of line 7 through the word "act," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "1st day of January in the year 1930, and every tenth year thereafter."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD], who offered the amendment, desire to be heard?

Mr. McLEOD. No, Mr. Chairman. I believe the amendment is self-explanatory.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment. I would like to call to the attention of the friends of this measure, and particularly the friends of reapportionment, what the change in dates proposed in this amendment, and in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], and the amendment which is proposed to be offered later, changing the time of taking the census from November 1 to May 1, is going to do to this bill, and particularly to the reapportionment feature of the bill.

It seems to me that the time has come when the friends of this measure, when the friends of reapportionment, should get together and see that the bill is not torn to pieces here on the floor of the House and made unworkable largely because of the peculiar set up of the organization of the House and the fact that it has not been possible to have the legislation considered in committee.

The Director of the Census, in his testimony before the Senate committee, very strongly urged that the enumeration be started on November 1, 1929. The Secretary of Commerce urged that date. The present President of the United States, when he was Secretary of Commerce, urged that date. They all say that people are more at home at that time of the year than at any other time, that it is easier and more convenient to find the people at home, and that their experience teaches them that November 1 is the best date in the year on which to start the enumeration.

The gentleman from Virginia, I understand, made a constitutional argument against the date, because 10 years had not elapsed since the taking of the last census, but the Constitution does not say that 10 years must elapse between the taking of the censuses, but says that the enumeration shall be made "within every subsequent term of 10 years," and, certainly, November 1, 1929, is within 10 years from the date when the last census was taken.

This whole matter was gone into before the Senate committee and on the floor of the Senate, and the Director of the Census, as I said, testified very strongly in favor of this date of November 1.

Referring particularly to the reapportionment feature of the bill, I wish the friends of the legislation would turn to the last section of the bill. They will find there that the President is required to make a report of the census to the Congress at the short session which convenes in December, 1930, and he must do it within the first week of the convening of that session or the reapportionment goes over for another 10 years, and in that connection I call your attention to the testimony of the Director of the Census before the Senate committee that if this date is put over to May 1 it is more than likely it will be impossible for the Bureau of the Census to complete the enumeration in time to enable the President to make such report within the time required. It will be quite likely that the President of the United States will not be able to comply with that provision of the law, and therefore there will be no reapportionment under the next census, as there has been none under this census.

What does the Director of the Census say? Here is what he said in testifying before the Senate committee:

We have considered the entire country, and have considered all the seasons, and we think that in this country most of the people are at their usual place of abode in the fall season, and we think November 1 is about the best day on which we could find the largest number of people at their usual place of abode, and the enumerators would have less occasion to assign people to some other places than they are found.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Then the director was asked:

What is the objection to the 1st of May?

Mr. STEUART. I do not believe, sir, that you will find as many people at their usual places of abode on the 1st of May as you will on the 1st of November. * * *

Then he comes to the reapportionment feature:

And then, the reapportionment law requires the Census Bureau to certify this population to Congress at the opening of the second session of the Seventy-first Congress, and I doubt very much * * *

The Director of the Census, of whom the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] very justly has spoken so highly, says:

And I doubt very much whether we could get those figures in shape for Congress by December 1 if the census was not taken until May 1—

And so on.

Now, gentlemen, friends of this measure, do not let the men who want to defeat this bill, do not let the men who want to defeat reapportionment, put in these amendments which are going to make the bill unworkable and which are going to defeat the very purpose of the bill. I call upon you to keep in mind what the effect of this amendment is. This particular amendment I know is offered in good faith, but these other amendments are offered to destroy the bill, and if we are going to put them on as the opponents of this legislation ask us to put them on, we might as well defeat the legislation, and I believe the thing for us to do now is to defeat all of these amendments that are proposed for the purpose of changing dates, and then when the committee rises have a separate vote on the Rankin amendment which has changed the date from 1929 to 1930, vote the others down in committee and vote that one down when we get into the House and let the dates stay in the bill as the bill passed the Senate and keep the bill in shape where the Director of the Census and others who have practical information about it say it will work. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, we certainly have a new Daniel come to judgment in the person of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. I have been on the committee with these other gentlemen a long time, and while we have not agreed on everything, it has never occurred to me to be as suspicious of them, even though they are Republicans, as the gentleman from Michigan seems to be from his statement just made in the well.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I believe I will.

Mr. MAPES. I am not suspicious of gentlemen on this side.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Michigan ought to have known that this amendment was satisfactory to every member of the committee on his side of the House.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. Just because the gentleman from Michigan does not agree with the gentleman from Mississippi, it does not follow that he is imputing improper motives to the gentleman from Mississippi or to anybody.

The gentleman from Michigan, as a matter of fact, has a very high regard for the gentleman from Mississippi, a high regard for his ability, his courage, and his aggressiveness, and he does not want the House to be captivated by the gentleman without having a clear idea of where he is leading it.

Mr. RANKIN. I would like to yield to the gentleman time enough for him to correct everything else he said. [Laughter.] Especially about his own colleagues.

Now, this matter was very thoroughly considered by the Committee on the Census. There was no division over it. We had Mr. Steuart there, and every Democrat and every Republican on the committee agreed on this date for taking the census. I know the gentleman from Michigan does not mean any harm, but his speech was so tempered that it is likely to mislead the House.

This amendment will not affect reapportionment. We have never taken a census as early as May, except in 1910 and 1920. This will not affect reapportionment. Do not get scared; you have over a hundred majority. The committee came to the conclusion that this was the proper date, and under the Constitution it was our duty to make it 1930.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. DENISON. Did not the Director of the Census say that it would be impossible to get the figures ready by the 1st of December if the census was taken in May?

Mr. RANKIN. The Director of the Census made no such statement before the House committee. He came before the House committee and approved of the date of May, 1930, and it is right here in the hearings.

Mr. DENISON. I thought the gentleman from Michigan read a statement by the Director of the Census that it would be impossible to get the figures ready by the 1st of December.

Mr. RANKIN. That was a statement before the Senate committee. Before the House committee no such statement was made.

Mr. GARBER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. GARBER of Oklahoma. Was there any evidence before the committee in opposition to the date of May, 1930?

Mr. RANKIN. No; not by the Director of the Census.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. MAPES] who is in my opinion one of the outstanding parliamentarians of the House and for whom I have great respect is in error as to my reason for offering these amendments. I want to explain the reason that these amendments were offered. In the event that the date of 1929 is not accepted by the House when that vote is taken and if 1930 finally stands in the bill, these amendments must be in because reapportionment under this bill would again be absolutely dead, at least for the present. These amendments were drawn by Mr. Beaman, the legislative drafting counsel, and if the date of 1929 stands, then they are necessary and the language is proper. These amendments will be withdrawn if the date is changed from 1930 to 1929.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. To those in favor of the reapportionment plan the position taken by the gentleman from Michigan is vital to this bill. If you are going to insist upon May 1, 1930, as the date of taking the census it is vital to reapportionment. The purpose of the gentleman from Michigan is that when the bill gets back to the House he will demand a separate vote on the Rankin amendment, fixing the date for taking the census on May 1, 1930.

It goes without argument that if you are going to provide May 1, as the census enumeration date, you would not have the time to compile those figures before the assembling date of the Congress following in December. Let us be reasonable about this, even though the Democrats have succeeded temporarily in having the date fixed as May 1, 1930. The matter of reapportionment is the main feature of this bill. I have gone through fights on this floor where it has been attempted to increase the membership of the House from 435 to 460, and as the years go on, without this reapportionment plan, there will be attempts to increase it further to 525 and 625, if every State is going to be recognized that happens to fall a little short in the population. The House is unwieldy enough now with 435 Members. Let us stick to a practical proposition, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] says, and have it as of November, 1929. Let us not agree to the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD] at the suggestion of the scrivener of the committee. Vote them down and when we go back in the House we will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and keep intact the principle of the reapportionment plan.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there is no occasion for alarm. I resent what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] stated when he declared that the amendments now being offered to this bill are being offered by those who are opposed to it. [Applause.] If Mr. RANKIN had not offered his amendment changing the date to 1930, I would have done it myself, because I had one prepared for that purpose. [Applause.] I would have done it not because I am opposed to this measure but because I am in favor of it and have still some respect for the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.] Let this amendment prevail. Let other amendments that of necessity have to be made prevail. There will not be any trouble about the workableness of this measure. The gentleman who appeared before this Census Committee of the Senate after having appeared before the Census Committee of the House and declared himself in favor of taking the census in May, 1930, must have had some change in his dreams.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. What caused it I do not know, but I know that when he stated you would find more people at home in November than you would in May, he did not know what he was talking about. I know this to be true in my district, about half agricultural and half manufacturing. Thousands and thousands of young men who work on the farms in the summer time in late October or early November go into our great steel mills and work during the winter and they are not then at home.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman is aware, of course, that between the time when the Director of the Census appeared before the Census Committee of the House and the time when he appeared before the Committee on the Census of the Senate the Senate had combined the reapportionment and census legislation and had made it mandatory upon the President, in order to reapportion the House, to report the results of the census to the Congress next December, and that fact may have influenced the Director of the Census somewhat in saying it would be quite improbable whether he could get the report to the President in time if the taking of the census or the date of starting to take it was put off to May 1, 1930.

Mr. WOOD. But that would not justify him in saying that there would be more men at home in November than there would be in May.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, inadvertently the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] said the law would require the President to make the report next December. It is at the beginning of the second regular session, which would be December, 1930.

Mr. MAPES. Of course, that is understood.

Mr. WOOD. That is correct, so that there will be ample time. I wish to say, as I said here this morning, that if the fathers meant anything, they meant that after the taking of the first census there should be taken each 10 years thereafter another census, and we are asked to put ourselves in the ridiculous position of taking two censuses in one decennial term. If the logic of the gentleman be carried out, if we can take more than one census in each decennial period, then we could take one in 1929, another in 1930, and another in 1931, and another in each year during that 10-year period. I think it is the consensus of opinion of the membership of this House, and I believe it to be the honest judgment of the people of the country, that we should not deviate from the manner in which these censuses have been taken heretofore, and that we should take them at a time when the best results may be had. We all know this, that the census taken in 1920 was a farce, and largely a farce because it was taken in January. [Applause.] I have said all I desire to say, but I believe that in the interest of a good enumeration, in the interest of a logical taking of this census, the month of May should be adopted, and that the year 1930 should be adopted, and thus we will carry out the practice of more than 140 years. [Applause.]

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I quite agree with all that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has said in relation to the time of the taking of the census. Up in our northern country it begins to be impossible to get about by automobile travel in November, and what is true there is true of the northern tier of the States of the Union. Something has been said in respect to the attitude of the Director of the Census as to the date of making the enumeration. I have a communication from him written last November, just prior to the meeting of the last session of Congress, and I call your attention to what he said at that time. This letter is directed to myself and reads as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
November 7, 1928.

MY DEAR MR. GIBSON: The date of the taking of the census, referred to in your letter of the 5th instant, has been the subject of a great deal of discussion. It is important that the date fixed by the law be one on which the greatest number of the people will be at their usual places of abode. We must consider the date on which the majority of the people return from winter resorts to their usual places of abode in the spring, and the date on which people leave their usual places of abode for summer resorts.

As you know, the law passed by the House fixed May 1 as the most desirable date. Please have a talk with me before you take any action that may result in changing this date. I shall be glad to see you when you come to Washington.

WILLIAM M. STEUART, Director.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. What was the date of that letter?

Mr. GIBSON. The date of that letter was November 7, 1928. The letter indicates that the Director of the Census was then in favor of the May date.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment is of such importance that I shall ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 205, noes 19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report another amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McLEOD: Page 2, line 12, strike out the words "twelve months" and insert in lieu thereof the words "six months from the beginning of the enumeration."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the fifteenth and subsequent censuses shall be restricted to inquiries relating to population, to agriculture, to irrigation, to drainage, to distribution, to unemployment, to radio sets, and to mines. The number, form, and subdivision of the inquiries in the schedules used to take the census shall be determined by the Director of the Census, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD: Page 5, lines 19 and 20, after the word "distribution," strike out "to unemployment, to radio sets."

Mr. WOOD. That is to make it conform to what has already been done.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the census of the population and of agriculture required by section 1 of this act shall be taken as of the 1st day of November, and it shall be the duty of each enumerator to commence the enumeration of his district on the day following unless the Director of the Census in his discretion shall change the date of commencement of the enumeration in said district by reason of climatic or other conditions which would materially interfere with the proper conduct of the work; but in any event it shall be the duty of each enumerator to prepare the returns hereinbefore required to be made and to forward the same to the supervisor of his district within 30 days from the commencement of the enumeration of his district: Provided, That in any city having 2,500 inhabitants or more under the preceding census, the enumeration of the population shall be completed within two weeks from the commencement thereof.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 3, strike out the word "November" and insert in lieu thereof the word "May."

Mr. RANKIN. That is a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of all persons over 18 years of age when requested by the Director of the Census, or by any supervisor, enumerator, or special agent, or other employee of the Census Office, acting under the instructions of the said director, to answer correctly, to the best of their knowledge, all questions on the census schedules applying to themselves and to the families to which they belong or are related, and to the farm or farms of which they or their families are the occupants; and any person over 18 years of age who, under the conditions hereinbefore stated, shall refuse or willfully neglect to answer any of these questions, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $100 or be imprisoned not exceeding 60 days, or both, and any such person who shall willfully give answers that are false shall be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both.

And it is hereby made unlawful for any individual, committee, or other organization of any kind whatsoever, to offer or render to any supervisor, supervisor's clerk, enumerator, interpreter, special agent, or other officer or employee of the Census Office engaged in making an enumeration of population, either directly or indirectly, any suggestion, advice, or assistance of any kind, with the intent or purpose of causing an inaccurate enumeration of population to be made, either as to the number of persons resident in any district or community, or in any other respect; and any individual, or any officer or member of any committee or other organization of any kind whatsoever, who directly or indirectly offers or renders any such suggestion, advice, information, or assistance, with such unlawful intent or purpose, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $1,000.

And it shall be the duty of every owner, proprietor, manager, superintendent, or agent of a hotel, apartment house, boarding or lodging house, tenement, or other building, when requested by the Director of the Census, or by any supervisor, enumerator, special agent, or other employee of the Census Office, acting under the instructions of the said director, to furnish the names of the occupants of said hotel, apartment house, boarding or lodging house, tenement, or other building, and to give thereto free ingress and egress therefrom to any duly accredited representative of the Census Office, so as to permit the collection of statistics for census purposes, including the proper and correct enumeration of all persons having their usual place of abode in said hotel, apartment house, boarding or lodging house, tenement, or other building; and any owner, proprietor, manager, superintendent, or agent of a hotel, apartment house, boarding or lodging house, tenement, or other building who shall refuse or willfully neglect to give such information or assistance under the conditions hereinbefore stated shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $500.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question for information. On page 10, line 20, there is a maximum fine of $1,000 proposed as a penalty for—any individual, committee, or other organization of any kind whatsoever, to offer or render to any supervisor, supervisor's clerk, enumerator, interpreter, special agent, or other officer or employee of the Census Office engaged in making an enumeation of population, either directly or indirectly, any suggestion, advice, or assistance of any kind, with the intent or purpose of causing an inaccurate enumeration of population to be made—

And so forth. It seems to me that is one of the gravest offenses that might possibly occur in the taking of the census, and the committee has only provided a fine. This is an offense that may be wholesale, with fraudulent intent. Does not the chairman of the committee think there ought to be added imprisonment for possibly a year or both such fine and imprisonment? How does it come about that was not done?

Mr. FENN. I will say to the gentleman that it came about in the Senate. The gentleman well knows that this bill has never been before the Census Committee of the House. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas is worthy to be added here by way of amendment. The House has never had an opportunity to thoroughly digest this bill until to-day.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to strike out the period and add to the fine "or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both," in line 20 of page 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas: Page 10, line 20, after the figures "$1,000," strike out the period and add "or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GLOVER. Do you not think you ought to strike out the word "misdemeanor" and make that a felony?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, may I have the privilege of offering a correction of the language by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment as modified by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas: Page 10, line 20, after the figures "$1,000," strike out the period and add "or be imprisoned for not exceeding one year, or both."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That it shall be the duty of every owner, official, agent, person in charge, or assistant to the person in charge, of any company, business, institution, establishment, religious body, or organization of any nature whatsoever, to answer completely and correctly to the best of his knowledge all questions relating to his respective company, business, institution, establishment, religious body, or other organization, or to records or statistics in his official custody, contained on any census schedule prepared by the Director of the Census under the authority of this act, or of the act to provide for a permanent Census Office, approved March 6, 1902, or of acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto; and any person violating the provisions of this section by refusing or willfully neglecting to answer any of said questions, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $500, or imprisoned for a period not exceeding 60 days, or both so fined and imprisoned, and any person violating the provisions of this section by willfully giving answers that are false shall be fined not exceeding $10,000 or imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, or both.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking what the committee has in mind with reference to obtaining information from a religious body.

Mr. FENN. To make inquiry of the pastor of a church or warden, I presume. I do not know.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is that within the scope of the census?

Mr. FENN. I presume it is. Somebody desired a religious census, so this was put in by the Senate.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But we want to know what we are doing. In the taking of the census is it required that information be gathered on the question of religion?

Mr. FENN. Only as far as embodied in this bill, if it becomes a law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is not provided for in section 1, is it?

Mr. FENN. No; it is not provided for anywhere else but here.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not understand the purpose of it.

Mr. FENN. All of this questionnaire is to be made up by the Director of the Census, and I do not understand it is to be a denominational census.

Mr. COLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. COLE. Every census makes a complete report of church organizations.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is that within the contemplation of this bill?

Mr. COLE. You will find that information in every census; in fact, they issue a special volume on church statistics.

Mr. FENN. If the gentleman from New York will examine the language of the section he will find it relates to—

Any company, business, institution, establishment, religious body, or organization of any nature whatsoever.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And that would take in any kind of a society, secret or fraternal?

Mr. FENN. I presume so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, if you can get information from them you are good.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That all mail matter, of whatever class or weight, relating to the census and addressed to the Census Office, or to any official thereof, and indorsed "Official business, Census Office," shall be transmitted free of postage, and by registered mail if necessary, and so marked: Provided, That if any person shall make use of such indorsement to avoid the payment of postage or registry fee on his or her private letter, package, or other matter in the mail, the person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of $300, to be prosecuted in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee, or anyone else who can answer it, a question with reference to section 11, which has just been read. We have adopted an amendment to the bill which requires the enumerators to obtain certain information in regard to foreigners who are in this country, and particularly foreigners who are unlawfully in the country, but it has not been entirely disclosed for what purpose. Now section 11 provides that the information furnished under the provisions of this act shall be used only for the statistical purposes for which it is supplied, and no publication shall be made by the Census Office whereby the data furnished by any particular establishment or individual can be identified, nor shall the Director of the Census permit anyone other than the sworn employees of the Census Office to examine the individual reports. Now if we leave the amendment with reference to the enumeration of foreigners in the bill the Census Bureau will not be allowed to give out or furnish any information received as to any particular foreigner; that is, if section 11 remains in the bill. I am wondering whether that section ought to remain in the bill if we keep in the bill the Bankhead amendment in regard to enumerating foreigners.

Mr. FENN. If the gentleman will permit, how would it do to add after the word "reports," in line 20, a comma instead of the period, and insert "except as otherwise provided in the bill"?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, did we not pass that section a little while ago and is not the gentleman a little late in making his suggestion?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I am not offering any amendment. I was merely presenting a question which I thought might solicit some information for the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is showing the futility of the Bankhead amendment.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FENN. Can we go back to this section after passing it?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, may I make my position plain? I am not asking to go back or offering any amendment, but I have the right to comment on any part of the bill. Mr. Chairman, I have not asked for any time on this bill, and I certainly am within my rights if I rise and ask for a moment to call attention to an inconsistency in the bill with a view to permitting the committee to cure it if they wish to do so. I am not asking to return to section 11 and take out anything or add anything.

Mr. DYER. What is the gentleman's complaint?

Mr. DENISON. I am not making any complaint. I was calling the attention of the chairman of the committee and of the House to what I thought was an inconsistency between this provision of the bill and the Bankhead amendment that has been approved.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Certainly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I called the attention of the committee earlier in the day in opposing the amendment which was adopted, and so did the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], to the fact that the information obtained could not be used against any person and was not available for use.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That has always been the law and will continue to be the law, whether this is a mistake or not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And that is the history and tradition of census information.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That there shall be in the year 1934, and once every 10 years thereafter, a census of agriculture and livestock, which shall show the acreage of farm land, the acreage of the principal crops, and the number and value of domestic animals on the farms and ranges of the country. The schedule employed in this census shall be prepared by the Director of the Census. Such census shall be taken as of the 1st day of November and shall relate to the crop year. The Director of the Census may appoint enumerators or special agents for the purpose of this census in accordance with the provisions of the permanent census act.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. It is manifest that in line 3 the year "1934" should be stricken out and "1935" inserted to correspond with an amendment recently adopted to the bill. I therefore offer that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FENN: Page 14, line 3, strike out the figures "1934" and insert "1935."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this simply to call attention to the language "the 1st day of November." Is it the intention of the committee to change that?

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to strike out, in line 10, the word "November" and insert the word "May."

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FENN. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Should not that be as of the 1st day of January? Is not that the date as of which you are taking the census?

Mr. FENN. No; we are taking it as of the 1st day of May. We begin the census on the 1st day of May.

Mr. BURTNESS. This does not relate to the time of taking it. This relates to the date as to when the information you get is to be applied, and my understanding is you are trying to get information as of the 1st day of January.

Mr. FENN. No; as of the 1st day of May.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I shall offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FENN: Page 14, line 10, strike out the word "November" and insert in lieu thereof the word "May."

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment to strike out the word "May" and insert the word "January."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BURTNESS: Strike out the word "May" in the Fenn amendment and insert in lieu thereof the word "January."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FENN], who made the original motion, has accepted the amendment and that the amendment really expresses what he desires to put in the bill, which is the 1st of January.

Mr. FENN. That is true.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. You are going to take a census in the rural districts as of the 1st of January?

Mr. FENN. No; this is to furnish the statistics on the agricultural crops.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I am talking about the agricultural census. There is about as much sense in that as in some of the other amendments that have been adopted.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BURTNESS) there were—ayes 127, noes 12.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized at his discretion, upon the written request of the governor of any State or Territory or of a court of record, to furnish such governor or court of record with certified copies of so much of the population or agricultural returns as may be requested, upon the payment of the actual cost of making such copies and $1 additional for certification; and that the Director of the Census is further authorized, in his discretion, to furnish to individuals such data from the population schedules as may be desired for genealogical or other proper purposes, upon payment of the actual cost of searching the records and $1 for supplying a certificate; and that the Director of the Census is authorized to furnish transcripts of tables and other records and to prepare special satistical compilations for State or local officials, private concerns, or individuals upon the payment of the actual cost of such work: Provided, however, That in no case shall information furnished under the authority of this act be used to the detriment of the person or persons to whom such information relates. All moneys hereafter received by the Bureau of the Census in payment for labor and materials used in furnishing transcripts of census records or special statistical compilations from such records shall be deposited to the credit of the appropriation for collecting statistics.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 9, after the word "special," strike out "satistical" and insert in lieu thereof the word "statistical."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

This is a pro forma amendment, Mr. Chairman, to call attention to one matter which I think ought to be called to the attention of the committee. It may not be of any value but I want to call it to the attention of the committee.

We have adopted what is known as the Bankhead amendment which requires the taking of information with reference to aliens in the country who are unlawfully here.

Of course, it is against the law for aliens to come in improperly and they commit a crime when they do so. We have adopted that amendment which requires aliens to answer questions which, of course, will incriminate them. That is the effect of the Bankhead amendment.

The bill requires all questions to be answered under severe penalties if they refuse, and it also provides severe penalties if they make a false answer.

The section just read contains this provision, which I wish to call to your attention:

Provided, however, That in no case shall information furnished under the authority of this act be used to the detriment of the person or persons to whom such information relates.

If a man has improperly come into this country, has been smuggled in, and an enumerator comes to him and asks him for information as to how he got here and he gives the information, this information can at no time, if the act is passed in this form, be used to his detriment, and, in my judgment, you will be granting immunity to the foreigners who are improperly in the country.

I am merely suggesting this. The House is not in a very legislative mood. You are not giving serious consideration to this bill at all. You are trying to get through with it this afternoon without consideration. Do we want to grant immunity to all the foreigners who have been smuggled into this country improperly?

Now, in my judgment, if we pass the bill with both this provision and the Bankhead amendment, you are going to give immunity to everyone disclosing information as to his unlawful entry into the country.

Mr. DOWELL. We would grant nothing except as to his testimony. If he is here unlawfully, he may be deported irrespective of that and it will have no effect.

Mr. DENISON. The act does not say you can not use any "statement" made by a person; it says you can not use the "information" he gives. Any facts that he discloses you could not use against him. I present this suggestion for what it may be worth. I think there should be some amendment to this section if you do not want to grant immunity to aliens who are interrogated and who furnish information showing their illegal entry.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The trouble comes here: Under the act of 1924 the burden of proof is on the alien to prove that he is legally here. He is deportable for all time. Prior to 1924 that was not the case. Those entering prior to 1921 had the right to come as a visitor and remain. A sailor that came in could leave the ship illegally, remain three years, and then he is lawfully here. What kind of an answer can they make to the average enumerator?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman from Illinois is a good lawyer and has suggested an important matter, but does not my friend feel that this provision ought to follow if the Bankhead amendment is retained and for this reason. If the Bankhead amendment remains in the bill, it will enable information to be had for a special purpose and would prevent the information from being used against the man giving the information. Does not the gentleman believe that that ought to be the case? Information is elicited from immigrants illegally in this country, and later the immigrant is arrested under the general statute making such presence in this country illegal. With this provision in the law he could not be confronted, and he ought not to be, by the statement he made to the enumerator.

Mr. DENISON. The bill does not say the "statement" may not be used, but rather the "information," which means the facts that he discloses could not be used against him, or to his detriment. In other words, any facts or information he furnishes could not be used to deport or to punish him.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Then, is not my colleague mistaken?

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What is before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. DENISON. I yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does not the gentleman's argument force us to this conclusion, that the Bankhead amendment ought to be defeated by the House for the reason that the Bankhead amendment calls for certain information, and if the individual refuses to give that information he is subjected to prosecution, and the information that he is asked for would be information that he is not compelled to divulge under the constitutional provision?

Mr. DENISON. I think either the Bankhead amendment ought to go out or this provision I have referred to should go out, because I think this provision would give an alien complete immunity.

Mr. BURTNESS. One or the other ought to go out.

Mr. THURSTON. Under the selective draft act young men were required to come in and give information that was not available to the public. This very same process was used in the selective draft.

Mr. DENISON. No provision of this kind was in the selective draft law. I think the Bankhead amendment ought to go out of the bill, because it will accomplish nothing and would require a lot of hard, difficult work which the enumerators will not be prepared to do. The information furnished by the aliens unlawfully here could not be disclosed and used for any useful purpose, and when once such information or facts have been disclosed by the aliens in response to the requirements of the bill they could not afterwards be used either to punish or deport them. We will make a mistake if we pass the bill in that form.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 22. That on the first day, or within one week thereafter, of the second regular session of the Seventy-first Congress and of each fifth Congress thereafter, the President shall transmit to the Congress a statement showing the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed, as ascertained under the fifteenth and each subsequent decennial census of the population, and the number of Representatives to which each State would be entitled under an apportionment of the existing number of Representatives made in the following manner: By apportioning the existing number of Representatives among the several States according to the respective numbers of the several States as ascertained under such census, by the method used in the last preceding apportionment and also by the method of equal proportions, no State to receive less than one Member.

If the Congress to which the statement required by this section is transmitted fails to enact a law apportioning Representatives among the several States, then each State shall be entitled, in the second succeeding Congress and in each Congress thereafter until such apportionment law shall be enacted or a subsequent statement shall be submitted as herein provided, to the number of Representatives shown in the statement based upon the method used at the last preceding apportionment; and it shall be the duty of the Clerk of the last House of Representatives forthwith to send to the executive of each State a certificate of the number of Representatives to which such State is entitled under this section. In case of a vacancy in the office of Clerk, or of his absence or inability to discharge this duty, then such duty shall devolve upon the officer who, under section 32 or 33 of the Revised Statutes, is charged with the preparation of the roll of Representatives elect.

This section shall have no force and effect in respect of the apportionment to be made under any decennial census unless the statement required by this section in respect of such census is transmitted to the Congress within the time prescribed in this section.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I send the following amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 4, and again in line 6, before the word "existing," insert the word "then."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FENN. I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 8, strike out all after the comma down to and including line 11, and insert: "By the method known as the method of major fractions, also by the method known as the method of equal proportions, and also by any different method used in the last preceding apportionment, no State to receive less than one Member."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 16, strike out all after the word "thereafter" down to and including the word "provided" in line 18, and in lieu thereof insert the following: "until the taking effect of a reapportionment under this act or subsequent statute."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RANKIN: Page 17, line 12, strike out down to and including line 9 on page 18.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that this amendment will be adopted. It simply means that if we adopt this amendment this not only ends this debate but it will be the last amendment offered to the bill. It strikes out that provision delegating the power to reapportion the Congress to the Department of Commerce or to the President of the United States.

If this amendment be adopted the amendment to exclude aliens from the count, of course, will not be reached, because it would be offered to a part of the language stricken out. It leaves with the Congress of the United States, after the census is taken and report made to Congress—and it will mean this present Congress—the power to make the reapportionment itself. It leaves that prerogative that was given us by the Constitution in our hands. If this amendment is voted down, then, of course, the other amendment will be offered. If it is voted down, one or both of them will be offered on motions to recommit.

It will be only a year. You will have reapportionment just as early by adopting this amendment as by voting it down. Those of us who have been opposed to reapportionment under the census of 1920 have been so because of the lack of accuracy in that census, and practically everyone of us has announced that just as soon as we can get an accurate census of all the American people taken, we propose to come back here, to this Congress, not the next one, and pass a reapportionment bill.

You will get reapportionment just as quickly and at the same time you will not be surrendering powers vested in you by the Constitution and by the people whom you represent. I sincerely trust that this amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The committee divided, and the tellers reported.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I challenge the accuracy of the vote. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATTERSON] voted under a misapprehension.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I was counted as No. 6 on the negative side. I intended to vote with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] for the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. One vote ought to be taken off the vote in the negative and added to the affirmative.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suggest that could only be done by having the vote retaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The fact that the gentleman made a mistake in voting does not furnish any ground for challenging the vote. If the gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to change his vote, the Chair will entertain such a request.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make that request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to change his vote. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. On this vote, taking into consideration the change just made, the tellers report—ayes 148, noes 157.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. THURSTON: Page 17, line 1, after the word "taxed," insert "and excluding aliens."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. When on the 1st day of May, our learned authority on constitutional law, and our good friend, Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, so admirably propounded what he thought the right of the House to accomplish through legislation the change now sought by this amendment, his argument was so powerful that almost was I persuaded, but upon reflection it seemed prudent first to go somewhat back of where he began. He took the Constitution as it stands to-day, analyzed its phrases, defined its words. He did not lay before this House anything about the history of the phrase in the Constitution that should govern. So once more have I read Madison's Journal; I have even gone to the Journal of the Confederation; and I do not believe there is any man here who will do that same thing and then say that it is within the constitutional power of this House to put into abiding law the amendment now offered.

I agree with the report made to the Senate by its legal counsel to the effect that it is not within the constitutional power of Congress to do this thing.

Let me remind you that there were two great compromises in the Federal Convention. Curiously enough, they both confront us at this very time. One was the compromise by which the small States obtained equal power with the large States in the Senate in return for the right of the House to initiate programs respecting revenue. The other is before you now.

Mind you, this is the second of the great compromises, the great bargains, the great pledges, upon which this Union was founded.

The discussion in the Federal Convention was a sequel to the attempt of the Congress of 1783 to secure authority for levying taxes upon the States composing the confederation on the basis of population. That Congress by resolution advised its delegates to ask instructions to this effect:

All charges of war and all other expenses * * * shall be supplied by the several States in proportion to the whole number of white and other free citizens and inhabitants, of every age, sex, and condition, including those bound to servitude for a term of years, and three-fifths of all other persons not comprehended in the foregoing description, except Indians not paying taxes, in each State; which number shall be triennially taken and transmitted to the United States in Congress assembled, in such mode as they shall direct and appoint.

Of course, the instructions were not granted by the States—jealous, suspicious, parsimonious, weakly confederated. Hence one of the reasons for the convention of 1787.

When it met, Randolph in opening the work proposed resolutions, one of which was—

That the rights of suffrage in the National Legislature ought to be proportioned to the quotas of contribution, or to the number of free inhabitants, as the one or the other rule may seem best in different cases.

Charles Pinckney presented a plan in more detail, which read:

The legislature shall hereinafter regulate the number of delegates by the number of inhabitants. * * * The proportion of direct taxation shall be regulated by the whole number of inhabitants of every description.

From the start and throughout the convention the struggle was over the combining of these two things.

The problem was not as to the representation of individuals or the rights of men as men. The issue was as to the rights of property, and the question was whether or not the count of population was adequate to disclose the wealth of the States. I will read to you two very brief extracts to show the difference of opinion. Here is what Colonel Mason said July 11:

He urged that numbers of inhabitants, though not always a precise standard of wealth, was sufficiently so for every practical purpose.

Mind you, he thought it was enough to count the heads in order to measure the wealth. Gouverneur Morris on the same day took the opposite view:

His great objection was that the number of inhabitants was not a proper standard of wealth.

The representation of what our fathers spoke of as "blacks," based upon three-fifths of the number, was not because they were citizens, not even because they were persons, but because they were property. Said Charles Pinckney:

The blacks are the laborers, the peasants, of the Southern States. They are as productive of pecuniary resources as those of the Northern States. They add equally to the wealth and, considering money as the sinew of war, to the strength of the Nation.

Slaves were property. The concession of added membership in this body, granted for that reason and that only, gave the South for many years an excess of power in this body.

After the convention had earnestly and anxiously discussed its differences for many days, when conference and compromise had at last brought the stubborn disputants toward agreement, on the 26th of July the various resolutions up to that time tentatively accepted were referred to the committee on detail. One reads:

Resolved, That a census be taken of all the inhabitants; * * * and that the Legislature of the United States shall proportion the direct taxation accordingly.

The census was to be taken of all the inhabitants on the ground that inhabitants measured property, and here was further phraseology to determine the measure of property.

The census was not to be taken to count the number of persons that might be represented. The census was taken that by finding the number of persons inhabiting the various States knowledge might be had of their comparative wealth. The primary problem, first, last, and all the time, was the allotment of taxes.

This final solution of the dilemma was the second pillar for the arch of the Union. The first was the compromise upon which in these recent days has hung the fate of the debenture plan. This second pillar for the arch of the Union was an agreement that the States should be represented in the lower branch in proportion to the number of their inhabitants. Note well that through the convention the word "inhabitants" was used, and clearly always with its comprehensive meaning as in the resolution of 1783, when it was extended at one time with this particularity, that it should include "the whole number of whites and other free citizens and inhabitants of every age, sex, and condition." The fathers meant to include the women and the children. They meant to include every resident human being of white complexion. They meant to include aliens.

And they meant to do this in order that the States might be represented in the lower branch in proportion to their agricultural, their industrial, and their commercial interests—their wealth.

It was political doctrine that might not prevail to-day. Were we writing the Constitution, we might change it in this particular. But until it is changed our action should be, and the action of the courts will be, determined by what the Constitution meant when its acceptance made this Nation possible.

When at last the body of resolutions agreed upon went to the committee on style, that committee consolidated the provisions about representation and taxation. It had no authority to change purport. Its only duty was to put meaning in the best English, the clearest language, the simplest form. It consolidated the provisions about Representatives and direct taxes, and it spoke of "number"; but there is not a shadow of suggestion, not an inch of ground, not an iota of reason for surmise that "respective numbers" and "free persons" did not mean "number of free inhabitants."

These facts about the history of the matter in the Federal convention were not brought to attention in debate in either branch, so far as I have observed, until yesterday. The gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] was, I think, the first man in all the discussion to hit the nail on the head. I but somewhat elaborate and emphasize the story. There was not a large attendance yesterday at the time. Some Members may not have understood the point brought out. With the gentleman from California I hold that this Union exists because, in part, of the pledge of our fathers that in the census account should be taken of every inhabitant, no matter what the age, sex, or condition. In the face of unquestionable history no unprejudiced man can for one moment think that it is within our constitutional power to pass the amendment now proposed.

Oh, some one may say, "Let the court decide about this matter." I can not conceive that course to be the privilege of any Member of Congress. I believe it is the duty of every man here to decide this question of constitutionality and every other as his judgment tells him to decide. [Applause.]

No man's conscience will be easy if he casts his vote knowing that he violates the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON]. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOCH as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. THURSTON: Page 18, after line 4, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"The word 'persons' as used in this section shall not be construed to include aliens. If any provision of this section is declared unconstitutional the validity of the remainder of the act shall not be affected thereby."

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I think you all know the feeling I have as to the merits of this proposition, and it is with considerable hesitancy that I have offered this amendment. When we had the reapportionment bill under consideration before I did not offer the amendment because I had proceeded upon the theory that it required a constitutional amendment. I say frankly to the committee now that I think there is perhaps a stronger argument holding that it does require a constitutional amendment than otherwise. But I do not think it is free from doubt. I believe there is a debatable question here, and, believing as deeply as I do in the merits of the proposition, I have offered the amendment in the form I have offered it, providing specifically that if this construction of the word "persons" shall be held unconstitutional it shall not affect the validity of this act; in other words, I have inserted the usual separability provision so as not to jeopardize this act in case this particular construction of the word "persons" is held unconstitutional. I have always supported reapportionment legislation.

I may say that I listened with a great deal of interest to the argument of our distinguished colleague from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER]. And if I may pause to say just a personal word to you, I can not refrain from saying in this connection that just 25 years ago I went to law school to the gentleman from Virginia [applause], and if it were not unfair to him I might say that what little I know about the law I imbibed in considerable part from him.

And I must say that when the gentleman from Virginia, one of the well-known constitutional lawyers of America, dean of the law school I attended, after weeks of careful study, comes before this House and tells the House solemnly, after reading all the debates and after making all of the inquiry, that in his judgment it does not require a constitutional amendment, I am led to offer the amendment in the form I have offered it, because I believe so profoundly in the justice of the proposal itself. [Applause.]

I have also read the arguments in the Constitutional Convention, and I agree with our distinguished friend from Massachusetts that it is the duty of every Member of this House to pass as best he can upon the question of the constitutionality of proposals that are made here, and I am not in sympathy with the argument that has been made upon this floor that since the Supreme Court might not pass upon it on the ground that it was a political question that therefore we would be at liberty to place it upon the statute books. I do not agree with that. I believe it is our duty to look into the question of constitutionality as best we may, and if I did not believe there is a substantial doubt here I certainly would not offer this amendment.

I want to call attention to a statement which Mr. Madison made in the Constitutional Convention, which I think places this issue upon the fundamental question involved. We are all familiar with the compromise to which the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] has alluded, the compromise between the small States and the large States, and when it came to the popular branch of the Congress to be set up, Mr. Madison laid down this fundamental proposition, and I quote from his language:

> He (Madison) appealed to the doctrine and arguments used by those on a former occasion. It had been very properly observed by Mr. Patterson, said Mr. Madison, that representation—> was an expedient by which the meeting of the people themselves was rendered unnecessary and that the Representatives ought, therefore, to bear a proportion of the votes which their constituents, if convened, would respectively have.

That is, in the House of Representatives—

In other words, he said this: The popular branch of the Congress is to represent the people of the United States and the Senate is to represent the States, and each State should therefore cast a vote in the popular branch of the Congress in the same proportion that its people would cast if they were collectively assembled; in other words, the legislative branch here is an expedient to take the place of the impossible assemblage of all the people to legislate for themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill whether it is the intention to finish this bill this evening?

Mr. FENN. I will state to the gentleman that if we can reach the time to vote at a reasonable hour we will proceed until that hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOCH. It is true that when the Constitution was framed the word "persons" would have been construed at that time to include aliens, although the word "aliens" had no clearly defined judicial meaning at the time the Constitution was adopted, for the reason that there were four, and I believe five, States which had no naturalization laws, and there was, therefore, no legal distinction common to all the States between an alien and a citizen.

It is true that in many, if not all, of the Colonies aliens were permitted to vote and they were therefore at that time an organic part of the people, or of the "persons," to use the word of the Constitution.

What is the situation now? By constitutional enactment in every State of this Union, with no exception, no alien can vote. Citizenship is now a condition precedent to suffrage by constitutional enactment of every State in the Union.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman has indicated that apportionment should be made based on the number of voters. Then would the gentleman——

Mr. HOCH. No; the gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman's argument so indicates.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Then how does the gentleman explain the State of Mississippi having eight Congressmen when they only cast 119,000 votes in the State?

Mr. HOCH. I can not yield further, as I do not wish to be diverted now from the immediate point I am discussing.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. If the gentleman's sentiments are correct, in 1868, when the second section of the fourteenth amendment was written, we had as many aliens then as we have to-day proportionate to our population, and why is it that our forefathers never put in the word "aliens" but just used the word "persons" and said, "excluding Indians not taxed." They left nothing to the imagination or to inference.

Mr. HOCH. I say that the same thing that applied when the Constitution was adopted, to which I have just referred, also applied at the time the fourteenth amendment was adopted. How many States there were at that time that permitted aliens to vote I do not know, but I believe that in 1917 there were still seven States which permitted those who had merely filed their declaration of intention, and were therefore still aliens, to vote. But that has been changed in all of those States, and to-day we have an entirely different situation from what we had when the Constitution was adopted or when the fourteenth amendment was adopted.

Applying, therefore, the proposition which Madison laid down, we get an entirely different situation now from that which existed when the Constitution was adopted. If all the people were collectively assembled, the aliens would not now be permitted to vote in matters of legislation. By constitutional enactment in every State we have now said that they can not vote. That being the case, why should the people of the States be permitted to count them now to determine representation here? To count them violates the fundamental proposition which Madison laid down and from the logic and force of which I do not believe there is any escape. Does not this consideration raise a serious question as to whether a construction of the word "persons" may not therefore be made by Congress which will carry out the real purpose of the framers to give to each State the same proportionate representation here that they would have if all the people were collectively assembled to legislate? It may not be conclusive but it is an argument which is entitled to most serious consideration.

Mr. FENN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HOCH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FENN. I ask this question, because I have great admiration for the gentleman's ability as a constitutional lawyer. Is the gentleman from Kansas himself satisfied that his amendment is within the provisions of the Constitution?

Mr. HOCH. I repeat what I said in opening. I am merely satisfied that it is a highly debatable proposition and therefore I have offered it believing I am within my rights in offering it upon that basis, with a provision specifically written into the amendment that if that particular construction of the word "persons" shall be held to be unconstitutional, it shall not affect the validity of the rest of this act.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman would concede that this change in representation would not be as drastic a change in government as the one that has been made in the election of the President of the United States, recognizing the fact that in the beginning it was presumed that the citizens of each State would meet and present the names of their candidates directly to the electors while to-day it is entirely done by political parties. In other words, the situation to-day is not the same as it was 150 years ago.

Mr. HOCH. There is point to the gentleman's reference. I am raising the question of whether the changed situation does not permit a changed construction of the word "persons." That is the question I am attempting to raise here.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Just for a moment, if the gentleman will permit, I would like to finish this particular thought.

By way of supporting the idea that there is uncertainty, I call attention to this further fact. In the fourteenth amendment you will recall that in the second section is the much-controverted provision with reference to the reduction of representation when suffrage is denied under certain circumstances—if any State shall deny the right to vote to any of its male inhabitants being 21 years of age and being citizens of the United States, and so forth, then the representation of that State shall be reduced accordingly.

Now, what sort of situation are we left in if we insist that the word "persons" necessarily includes aliens? Let me submit an illustration. Suppose the State of Pennsylvania, by way of illustration, should decide that the age of 21 is too low for suffrage. Plainly they have the right under the Constitution to change the age. Suffrage is solely a matter of State jurisdiction aside from such express limitations as those of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and the nineteenth amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for another five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. TINKHAM. Reserving the right to object, will the honorable Member answer a question if I propound it during the five minutes?

Mr. HOCH. I do not know whether I can answer one of the gentleman's questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOCH. I am sorry to take so much of the time of the committee.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that a parliamentary inquiry can not be submitted unless the gentleman from Kansas yields for that purpose.

Mr. HOCH. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. I want to state to the Chair that a gentleman here objected in plenty of time.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will desist a moment, the Chair will ask leave of the committee to say that there was no objection made by any gentleman standing in his place before the Chair announced there was no objection. [Applause.]

Mr. HOCH. I shall not impose upon the committee after this five minutes.

Now, suppose the State of Pennsylvania decides to raise the age of suffrage to 30 years, which they have the right to do under the Constitution.

Under the fourteenth amendment, if we enforce it, we would automatically reduce the representation of that State by the proportion of the number of people between 21 and 30 years of age who had been denied the right of suffrage.

Now, suppose there were 500,000 citizens in the State of Pennsylvania between the ages of 21 and 30 and also 500,000 aliens. We would deny to those 500,000 citizens the right to be counted in determining the number of Representatives from that State, and yet we would have the absurd situation of permitting the 500,000 aliens to be counted to determine the number of Representatives. The same absurd discrimination against citizens in favor of aliens would, of course, also result as to the electoral vote of the State. I call attention to that for the purpose of suggesting that there is some reasonable argument with reference to the interpretation of the word "persons," and it may be argued with no little force that we have the right to put an interpretation on the word "persons" that would not make the fourteenth amendment work an utterly absurd result. [Applause.]

Mr. TINKHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TINKHAM. Does not the first section of the fourteenth amendment indicate what citizens are and what aliens are when it says:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction equal protection of the law.

Is not the difference between a citizen and a noncitizen or an alien made directly in that section?

Mr. HOCH. The first section clearly states what a citizen is—a person born or naturalized in the United States. And, of course, in the amendment which would exclude aliens from the count in the apportionment we do not exclude children of aliens born in this country, because technically they are not aliens; they are citizens if born in the United States, even though their parents may never become naturalized. My amendment would only exclude those born abroad and who have never become naturalized.

I have heretofore discussed this question on its merits and in its various aspects. There is no time now to review the arguments.

But, in a concluding word in the minute I have remaining, I say that by no sound governmental reason, by no theory that harmonizes with the genius of our institutions, can we say that persons who have not taken the obligations of an American citizen, who may claim military exemption, who are permitted to go to a foreign ambassador here, representing the country of their allegiance, for representation in case their interests are involved—by no theory of American Government can you say on its merits that such aliens should be counted in determining representation in this House and in determining the electors whose number may change the result in the election of a President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I think that motion should come from this side of the House rather than that, and therefore I make the motion that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Mississippi to speak on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas. The gentleman from Connecticut moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH].

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the committee divided and there were 165 ayes and 124 noes.

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON], as amended.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, is not the effect of this vote whether or not the committee will adopt the Hoch amendment? In other words the Hoch amendment is a substitute for the Thurston amendment and the vote now is to adopt the Hoch amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the Thurston amendment as amended by the substitute.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by several Members) there were 183 ayes and 123 noes.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 18, line 9, after the word "section," insert a new section, as follows:
> "SEC. 23. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prevent the legislature of any States (subject, however, to the initiative and referendum law in any State wherein such a law exists), at any time after the approval of this act, in order to secure contiguous and compact territory and equalization of population in accordance with the rules enumerated in section 3 of the apportionment act, approved August 8, 1911, by concurrent resolution, redistricting the State for the purpose of electing Representatives to Congress, and upon each and every such redistricting the Representatives to Congress shall in any such State be elected from the new districts so formed."

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment. It is not germane to the bill. I would be very glad to have the Chair hear me if the Chair has any doubt about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had his attention called to this amendment by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], who placed it in the RECORD yesterday, and it will be found on page 2279. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York who offered the amendment whether he can point to any portions in the pending bill which refer to the matter of the redistricting of the States by the legislatures of the States?

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with a reapportionment act, and under Article I, section 4, of the Constitution it is provided as follows:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators.

That gives us authority and makes it germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's citation of the Constitution of the United States, the Chair thinks, would have no bearing on the pending bill. We are not considering any amendment to the Constitution. We are considering the present bill and amendments thereto. The Chair desires to give the gentleman an opportunity to show how the pending bill in any way relates to the redistricting of the States by the legislatures, if he can. The Chair has not been able to find anything in the bill which would relate to that subject.

Mr. REED of New York. But I submit that this Article I, section 4, of the Constitution gives us authority to enact legislation in this respect. We are now dealing with a reapportionment bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending bill does not relate to that subject, the Chair thinks.

Mr. CAREW. The fact that the gentleman's proposition might be constitutional does not make it germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had that in mind. Unless the gentleman wishes to argue the matter further the Chair is prepared to decide the point of order. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken and sustains the point of order.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TINKHAM: Page 17, line 1, after the word "taxed," insert the following: "and inhabitants in each State, being 21 years of age, and citizens of the United States, whose right to vote at an election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, has been denied or abridged, except for rebellion or other crime."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TINKHAM) there were—ayes 100, noes 121.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FENN and Mr. TINKHAM were appointed tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 145, noes 118.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, wait a moment. I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend that motion that it close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is in great disorder. The Chair will state that if the committee does not come to order, the Chair will cause the committee to rise automatically and report the disorder to the House, as is his privilege.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has offered an amendment that debate close in 15 minutes.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate upon the section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, if the proposed amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] pertains to the same subject as the amendment against which I just made the point of order, I desire an opportunity to talk against it for five minutes. If it is a modification of that amendment, I desire an opportunity to speak against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not informed as to what the proposed amendment is.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I shall amend my motion by making it 10 minutes, so that the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] can have 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair will put the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Connecticut is that all debate close in 10 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know why I should be cut off.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question was put, and the committee proceeded to divide.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TABER. Is not the question upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FENN]? The gentleman from New York proposed to amend the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, that the debate should close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that in the commotion, when nobody could be heard, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] attempted to offer an amendment to the motion offered by the gentleman from Connecticut. Subsequently the gentleman from Connecticut offered a new motion.

The Chair will state that if the gentleman from New York insists, although the membership of the House did not hear his amendment, the Chair will put his amendment, which was almost a secret between the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Connecticut. The committee will proceed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the question was taken on the motion of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that a point of order can be made when the vote has not been completed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The committee was dividing at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will overrule that point.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which the Chair has before him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

The amendment to the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FENN], that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN. I desire to inquire if it is not in order under the rules of the House that when a teller vote is taken the opposing sides count the vote. Is not that true?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no rule. The tellers are supposed to agree as to how they count the vote.

Mr. GREEN. I would like to know how the tellers who took this vote voted. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Did the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. FENN, vote in the negative?

Mr. FENN. By what right does the gentleman inquire?

Mr. GREEN. It is a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] will proceed. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REED of New York: Page 17, line 24, after the word "section," strike out the period, insert a colon and the following:

"Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prevent the legislature of any State (subject, however, to the initiative and referendum law in any State wherein such a law exists), at any time after the approval of this act, in order to secure contiguous and compact territory and equalization of population in accordance with the rules enumerated in section 3 of the apportionment act, approved August 8, 1911, by concurrent resolution, redistricting the State for the purpose of electing Representatives to Congress, and upon each and every such redistricting the Representatives to Congress shall in any such State be elected from the new districts so formed."

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this is to prevent a deadlock in the State legislature.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment. This is the identical amendment, word for word, which was ruled out by the committee and prevented from being added to the bill. Now an attempt is made to insert it in section 22 of the bill. I make the point of order on the same ground—that it is not germane to the bill. It pertains to something that the legislature is going to do after being notified as to how many Members will come from certain States. This bill only provides for the taking of the census and notifying the executive of each State how many Members that State is entitled to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield to me?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. If we try to finish this bill to-night we shall probably have two or three record votes and that will carry us far into the evening. If we might have an understanding that to-morrow we shall have a vote on this bill, it seems to me that it would be more convenient to the Members to do it that way.

Mr. RANKIN. We should continue to-night and get a vote on the bill and get rid of it.

Mr. TILSON. I am trying to provide for the comfort and convenience of the membership as much as possible. [Cries of "Vote!"] In order to test the sentiment of the House—and there is no politics in this; it is purely a matter of convenience to everybody—I move that the committee do now rise, and let us have a vote on that motion. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that in the event the committee rises, a point of order will be pending. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the chairman announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 177, noes 121.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CHINDBLOM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 312 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. KVALE (at the request of Mr. SELVIG) on account of business.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. J. Res. 92. Joint resolution to provide an appropriation for payment to the widow of John J. Casey, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow is Calendar Wednesday and there is one small resolution in connection with the French debt settlement to be considered. I ask unanimous consent that upon the completion of the consideration of the resolution referred to, Calendar Wednesday business may be dispensed with for the rest of the day and that the census and reapportionment bill may go on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that when the resolution to be reported by the Committee on Ways and Means shall have been acted upon it may be in order to take up Senate bill 312. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how long will it take on the French debt settlement resolution?

Mr. TILSON. Perhaps my friend from Texas could give more information about that than I can.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not know. Speaking for myself, I am opposed to that resolution, because I do not think it is necessary at the present time. I would like to ask the gentleman a question while I am on my feet, if I may. Will there be any number of unanimous-consent requests for the consideration of legislation to-morrow?

Mr. TILSON. I understand that there will be no unanimous-consent requests for the consideration of legislation to-morrow, unless it be a request for the consideration of the bill which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] asked to have considered the other day—a little appropriation for the Yellowstone Park, I believe.

Mr. GARNER. That will be the only one.

Mr. TILSON. That is the only one I now have any knowledge of.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will permit, I made two requests the other day, and the one I considered more important was the Indian appropriation for North Dakota. That was more urgent than the Yellowstone bill.

Mr. TILSON. Is that the one the gentleman had in mind when he spoke to me?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. That will be the only unanimous-consent request that the gentleman from Connecticut will permit to be offered to-morrow?

Mr. TILSON. I shall make that agreement with the gentleman, so far as I am able to control the matter.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask another question in the interest of information for the membership? Does the gentleman contemplate that the conference report on the farm relief bill will probably be reported to-morrow?

Mr. TILSON. I have hopes that it will be reported to-morrow so that we may act upon it Thursday.

Mr. HASTINGS. I did not quite understand. Is it expected to bring up the resolution to postpone the $400,000,000 French debt settlement to-morrow?

Mr. TILSON. It is to come up as Calendar Wednesday business.

Mr. HASTINGS. In advance of the completion of the pending bill?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. The gentleman will understand that the resolution referred to will be in order while the pending bill will not be in order until Calendar Wednesday business is out of the way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, in part my own remarks with regard to the Federal reserve system and in part the inclusion of a short letter which I have received from a constituent who has given considerable thought to this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Federal reserve system and to include a short letter. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, the agricultural interests of the Nation and many business enterprises and banks in the agricultural sections are going through a period of financial distress perhaps never before equaled in the history of our Government. We are assured that our people as a whole are prosperous—actually so wealthy that they have more money than they know what to do with. It may be that much of our so-called prosperity and wealth is represented only on paper and consists of balances, the commercial value of which may be at least questionable. Certainly there is greater speculation in stocks and bonds throughout the country than ever existed before. People in all circumstances and all classes are more or less interested in wild speculation. Conditions have become such that we are told the Federal Reserve Board contemplates raising the discount rate and doing other drastic things in order to check, if not break up excessive speculation. Whether they will do this remains to be seen, but the press discloses that the New York Federal Bank announced no changes in its rediscount rate of 5 per cent after the last directors' meeting, and thus we may assume nothing drastic is contemplated by the Federal Reserve Board for the present at least. Perhaps few, if any, doubt that rediscount rates can be so manipulated as to curb speculation. The board did so in such way 10 years ago, in forming its agricultural deflation policy, that it brought financial distress from which agriculture has not yet recovered and perhaps will not do so for many years. No doubt something should be done to curb speculation, but just what it should be is difficult to say.

It is claimed that many banks in agricultural communities are transferring funds to large financial centers to be used in speculation and that this is one reason why credit is so hard in agricultural sections. If such conditions exist, and are caused by reasons alleged, certainly something should be done to encourage such banks to function for the welfare of communities in which they are located rather than for speculative purposes in the large cities.

Herewith, under rule granted, I submit a letter written by a gentleman who has given considerable thought and study to our monetary and banking systems. Those who read this letter may realize, not only what has occurred but what may be going on under our present-day methods of banking and finance.

WHOSE MAN ARE YOU?

If a ray of light, weighing the thousandth part of a grain, traveling from the sun at a rate of one billion miles in a second, impinges an iceberg in mid-ocean, what will be the force of the stroke? The force will be the weight multiplied by the velocity.

While walking through an old field near the set of sun, yours truly was forcibly struck with an idea. It must have been a large idea, or a small one traveling at a great velocity, for the impaction on the cranium was momentous. He had been reading the history of finance and banking in this country, and the idea came forcibly that the banks and the money power not only now but most all the time have been the power behind the throne more powerful than the throne itself, have rendered this great Government subservient to their interests. The banks in every instance have governed the Government. The banks and the money power have, de facto, been the Government, and the machinery of rule and legislation, only their ready instrument in furthering their designs.

So the idea came to me, Whose man are you, H. W. Nalley? Why, my good sir, I belong to the banks and capitalists. Whose man are you? "I belong to the great American Republic," you say. Well, that simply makes you the servant of servants, for the Republic belongs to the money power. Better own up and save some of your credit by acknowledging your direct servitude at once.

In order to make all of this appear true we will give a few items of history. There is nothing like history.

The Bank of North America was chartered in 1781; capital limited to $10,000,000; issue, unlimited; the subscribed capital by Government, $254,000; by individuals, $146,000; no money paid in. The bank was run by the money paid in the Treasury by way of taxation, and individuals had just enough interest to gobble up all the spoils, and that, too, on money paid in as taxes on the people. This scheme lasted 10 years.

The Bank of the United States was chartered in 1791; capital, $10,000,000; two millions subscribed by the Government; eight millions by individuals. The Government had no money to pay its subscription, proposed to borrow it from the bank. The bank having no money to lend passed a credit of two millions on its bank to the Government, and the Government paid 6 per cent on the credit. This was a great deal better than the bank of 1781, for the Government not only furnished the major part of the capital by the taxes passing through it but actually paid 6 per cent on two millions to parties who did not have it to lend. Sold itself, bound hand and foot, into bondage, and thus it remained till Jackson's administration. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. Thus early in the infancy of the Republic the banks and money power made a tool of the people's Government for their own enrichment. "If such things occurred in the green tree, what may we expect in the dry?"

Still betterer and betterer. The charter was renewed in 1816; capital (limited) thirty-five millions; individuals subscribed twenty-eight millions; Government seven millions. The Government did not have the money, and the individuals did not have it to lend; so the Government pays 6 per cent interest to the individuals on its $7,000,000 for credit's sake. Angels and ministers defend us! Oh, ye gods, come down! All the money that was ever paid in was $350,000, while this cutthroat scheme was collecting interest from the people's Government on $7,000,000, and that through taxation. This itself was $420,000 annually, and more money than the individuals had paid in.

Then the bubble burst in 1832 by Andrew Jackson vetoing the bill to renew the charter. This almost created a war. It is strange now, in reviewing the past, that Jackson escaped assassination. Those who are old enough to recollect the time can well remember just what a howl was raised on this occasion. The whole world shook from center to circumference; the moon turned red, and the planets strayed from their predestined orbits. Great calamities were going to befall the Nation. A more hideous and monstrous crime was never perpetrated by any ruler in a free government. Such were the howlings and bellowings of the money sharks and those who were susceptible to their influence.

When the thing smashed up and a rendering had to be made, what was found in the bank? We find that individuals did not have as much interest. They had spent a portion of it in fast living and had issued money in the bank as the Government had first and last paid in as a large amount of irredeemable paper money on credit, for which credit the Government paid interest on. This ends the chapter. The country was then flooded with State banks till 1860. Some acted honestly and some rascally.

The Civil War was progressing. The Government issued notes and the banks were the first to refuse to take these notes. It issued legal tenders; they howled and protested. It issued interest-bearing notes by the million. This pleased them a little better. The Government issued interest-bearing bonds in order to reduce its circulation, and the treasurer perforce was compelled to travel by his agents all over the West to sell them. It issued the banking act allowing national banks to issue on the faith of the bonds bought from the Government. This pleased them, ah, ha! They then could pay the Government 1 per cent on their issue and lend it for 10 to 25 per cent. When the war closed, the banks had not in one single instance, without extravagant compensation, assisted the Government in maintaining its credit or in prosecuting the war. For what, then, was the Government under obligation to these money changers? Simply nothing. They had bought but a few of its bonds. Its bonds, its legal tenders, its interest-bearing coupon notes, all were out in 1865 among the people. The banks had hid its specie, and would not touch a paper without immediate profit.

These are irrefutable facts.

Now the dance commences. Now the speculation in Government paper is inaugurated. Now the banks assume that they must be paid for maintaining the credit of the Government. The maintaining of the credit of the Government after the war is over and peace is declared has always been a great thing with the bankers.

They buy up from the people the Government paper with specie hoarded and hid during the war. Then they have a law passed through Congress to pay them in specie. They buy again at half value, made payable in gold. They demonetize silver and buy again at a discount. Thus by a truculent Congress, and by their manipulations, they became masters of the situation. They dictate the price of corn, of wheat, and other products of labor. They have aggregated the money of the Nation to themselves so as to control it. They have gotten hold of all public works. They have absorbed the lands of the Nation. They have exempted themselves from taxation. The bonds that cost them 30 to 40 cents soon were worth by their manipulation $1.28. Mr. Farmer, the product of your labor has been reduced four times and their money has increased in value four times. You have paid the Civil War debt in the value of money it was contracted in more than three times, and you owe more to-day on this debt than in 1865 in the products of your labor. Kind and affectionate readers, yours truly wishes to know whose man are you? You may have some sprightly boys and some beautiful girls growing up, and I would like to know who they will belong to after you are dead.

This much on the money question showing its manipulation by a bunch of crooked individuals, before we finally bring you to the chapter when, through the efforts of the Democratic Party, during Wilson's administrations, you finally shook hands and parted with your monetary system to the greatest slave manufacturers that the human race has ever had to encounter.

THE TARIFF BILL

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the tariff bill, H. R. 2667.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the tariff bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAD SHOULD HAVE HIGHER DUTY

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, it is our understanding that we have been convened in this special session in the interest of agriculture, especially in the interest of those engaged in agriculture whose property and products are entirely too low in price in relation to the nonagricultural products; but inasmuch as the Ways and Means Committee has seen fit to go far afield the subject and purposes for which we have been convened in their tariff bill reported to the House, and have undertaken to adjust the import duties by raising them upon a great many nonagricultural products, it would seem to me very fitting and proper to raise the import duties upon lead products.

In southwest Missouri, northeastern Oklahoma, and southeastern Kansas are situated great lead and zinc mines where millions in money are invested in the lead and zinc mining industry, and here thousands of men are employed whose families are dependent upon their services to secure money with which to purchase the essentials of this life. The protective tariff policy of our Government is believed in and indorsed by the great majority of thinking people. The policy contemplates the placing of duties upon such imported products from foreign countries as are being or can be produced in the United States in such quantities as will supply the United States market demand. Of course, this protective tariff policy contemplates such immigration restriction laws as will secure employment at good wages for our American labor. It likewise contemplates the encouragement and inducement of American capital to seek investment in American industry with assurance of reasonable profits and returns thereon. The production of our needed agricultural products at home and our mineral products at home and our manufactured products at home where American labor is employed at good wages keeps within the United States the money paid out for our labor and all the products that our country produces. This keeping of our money at home enables our Government to easily maintain a high per capita circulating medium. And it insures the active circulating medium which makes money easy to get with which to purchase the things needed in this life, and with which to pay various kinds of taxes and other personal obligations.

These are some of the real merits of our American protective system. A protective-tariff duty should be sufficiently high to keep out foreign competition, thus making sufficient demand for the American product to insure its production in sufficient quantities to supply the market. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is within the United States a great abundance of labor to supply the market of the United States, but the price of lead has not been sufficiently high to induce the production of a sufficient quantity of it to supply our United States market. The tariff duty has been so low, considered in connection with the cheap labor and other costs in connection therewith, that foreign lead has been mined and imported into this country during the year 1928 to a very large per cent of our American production. The estimated quantity of lead produced in the United States and imported during 1928 was as follows:

	Tons
Lead produced in the United States	625,618
Lead imported in ore, matte, and bullion	154,382

The value of this 625,618 tons of United States produced lead was $76,325,396. For the 154,382 tons of imported lead there was paid $14,448,010. Foreign capital evidently yielded a profit to its owners and investors in producing the quantity of lead imported into the United States. For the production of the $14,448,010 of lead foreign labor was used.

While that foreign-produced lead was being mined and milled the capital of our mine owners and operators and the labor in and about our mines were unemployed and idle to the extent of the quantity required to produce the importations.

It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that the quantity of lead imported into the United States in 1928 was equal to almost one-fourth of the quantity produced in the United States. If our mines had been protected with a higher tariff duty, they could have produced all the lead required for our United States market. Our operators could have been active one-fifth more of the time, and our miners could have been employed and at work one-fifth more of the time. A higher duty on lead would have produced a demand for more labor, or labor more of the time. Our mines should have produced the $14,000,000 worth of ore that was imported from Mexico and Canada.

Ordinarily it is the duty of Congress to closely observe these industrial conditions and keep the protective tariff duties so adjusted as to protect and encourage not only American capital to be active but to give employment at good wages to American labor. If opportunity had been afforded, it was my intention and purpose, Mr. Chairman, to offer an amendment to our tariff schedule, raising the duty one-half cent per pound on imported lead in its various forms. It is my sincere belief that such an increase in the tariff duty would induce the production of sufficient lead from our mines to supply the entire market demand in the United States; would stimulate more activity of the lead industry; would give more employment to labor and better wages; would improve the business condition in all kinds of mercantile and industrial activity within the entire mining district. Mr. Chairman, had there been an opportunity afforded, as I sincerely think there should have been, to offer this amendment, I am sure it would have met with the hearty indorsement of a great majority of this Congress; because no sincere protectionist could or would have tried to justify the importation of between one-fifth and one-fourth of the total lead consumed in the United States. There has been an apparent increase in the consumption in the United States in 1928 of 62,000 tons of primary lead over that of 1927, which is a fact to be appreciated by all who are interested in the lead-mining industry.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. FENN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 5, 1929, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, June 5, 1929

(Legislative day of Tuesday, June 4, 1929)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled joint resolutions, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. J. Res. 61. Joint resolution to amend the appropriation "organizing the Naval Reserve, 1930";

H. J. Res. 82. Joint resolution making appropriations for additional compensation for transportation of the mail by railroad routes in accordance with the increased rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission;

H. J. Res. 84. Joint resolution extending until June 30, 1930, the availability of the appropriation for enlarging and relocating the Botanic Garden; and

H. J. Res. 92. Joint resolution to provide an appropriation for payment to the widow of John J. Casey, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

INTERNATIONAL PAPER & POWER CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General, submitting, in further response to Senate Resolution 53, amended statements concerning the owners and publishers of certain newspapers as filed with the department, pursuant to law, on April 1, 1929, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed as part 2 of Senate Document No. 11.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE,
ASSEMBLY CHAMBER,
FORTY-EIGHTH SESSION,
Sacramento.

Assembly Joint Resolution 8

Chapter 45

Assembly Joint Resolution 8, relative to memorializing Congress for Federal aid in the construction of a breakwater in Trinidad Harbor at or near the city of Trinidad, Calif.

Whereas the development of harbor facilities, deep-water harbors, and ports of refuge on the long coast line of California is of vital importance to the welfare of the State and the Nation; and

Whereas such facilities and ports are necessary to water-borne commerce, which is rapidly increasing on the Pacific coast; and

Whereas natural harbors along more than 750 miles of California coast line are limited to a few in number as compared to the Atlantic seaboard, and development of these harbors is extremely important to the ever-increasing productivity of the State; and

Whereas the city of Trinidad, Calif., is now seeking Federal assistance in the construction of a breakwater in Trinidad Bay for the development and improvement of a deep-water harbor which will serve as an outlet for the commerce and industry that will follow the development of northwestern California, with its millions of dollars worth of untouched and undeveloped natural resources; and

Whereas improvements made in Trinidad Harbor would facilitate the shipping of commerce to and from the tributary territory: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly and the senate jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California joins with the city of Trinidad in respectfully urging and requesting Federal assistance in this important project and the adoption by the Congress of the United States of appropriate legislation for the appropriation of the requisite funds to aid in the construction of said proposed breakwater; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit copies of these resolutions to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of War of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy of the United States, and to each of the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

EDGAR C. LEVEY,
Speaker of the Assembly.

Attest:

ARTHUR A. OHNIMUS,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on the Library:

CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE,
ASSEMBLY CHAMBER,
FORTY-EIGHTH SESSION,
Sacramento.

Assembly Joint Resolution 13

Chapter 39

Assembly Joint Resolution No. 13, relative to the California State Fair and the Western States Exposition

Whereas the seventy-fifth anniversary of the State fair of California is to be celebrated at Sacramento between the dates of August 31 and September 9, 1929, both dates inclusive; and

Whereas said annual State fair is to be held at Sacramento between said dates in conjunction with the Western States Exposition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That President Herbert Hoover and Mrs. Hoover be, and they are hereby, invited and most respectfully urged to attend the California State Fair and Western States Exposition at Sacramento, upon some convenient date or dates during the continuance thereof; and be it further

Resolved, That a suitably engrossed copy of this resolution be delivered to President and Mrs. Hoover and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from California.

(Introduced by Hon. Roy J. Nielsen.)

EDGAR C. LEVEY,
Speaker of the Assembly.

Attest:

ARTHUR A. OHNIMUS,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE,
ASSEMBLY CHAMBER,
FORTY-EIGHTH SESSION,
Sacramento.

Assembly Joint Resolution 16

Chapter 77

Assembly Joint Resolution No. 16, relating to resurvey of north boundary of Hoopa Indian Reservation and modification of Klamath River fish and game district initiative act

Whereas the Klamath River is the principal source of supply of salmon and steelhead trout spawn for artificial propagation of those species of food fishes in the State of California; and

Whereas the people of the State of California, by initiative act passed at the general election in November, 1924, ordained that the waters of the Klamath River were, and would thereafter be, the Klamath River fish and game district and prohibited the construction or maintenance of any dam or other artificial obstruction within the district; and

Whereas an effort is now being made to annul said initiative act by causing the United States to resurvey the north boundary of the Hoopa Indian Reservation along the lower Klamath River so as to relocate the said north boundary at a point 26 chains north of the position it has occupied since the early eighties, thus placing several miles of the river under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government and beyond the control of the initiative act; and

Whereas if this resurvey is allowed and approved by the Department of the Interior, dams will be constructed within the area thus beyond the provisions of the initiative act and the run of salmon and steelhead trout in the Klamath River will be totally destroyed, and the principal supply of the State's spawn will be eliminated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California hereby protests any change in or relocation of surveyed lines affecting in any manner the Klamath River within the State of California, as being an attempt to modify and annul the solemn act of the people of this State in creating the Klamath River fish and game district; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of this resolution and of this legislature that before any approval of any change in existing surveys, or before any new surveys be approved, that a public hearing or protests already on file be held under the authority of the Department of the Interior in the manner and form prescribed by law and existing regulations, at which time all parties interested may appear and be heard; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, and to all Senators and Representatives of California in Congress.

EDGAR C. LEVEY,
Speaker of the Assembly.

Attest:

ARTHUR A. OHNIMUS,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was ordered to lie on the table:

CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE,
ASSEMBLY CHAMBER,
FORTY-EIGHTH SESSION,
Sacramento.

Assembly Joint Resolution 17

Chapter 55

Assembly Joint Resolution 17, relative to measures for farm relief pending in the Congress of the United States

Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States has enacted a measure designed to accomplish comprehensive farm relief for all parts of this country; and

Whereas there is now pending before the Senate of the United States a similar measure, to which certain amendments have been proposed which, if adopted, will exclude from the relief provisions thereof fruits and vegetables and will thus work great hardship and irreparable injury upon the producers of such products throughout the United States, and especially within the State of California; and

Whereas the production and marketing of fruits and vegetables constitute one of the most important agricultural activities of this State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly and senate, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California does hereby request the Hon. HIRAM W. JOHNSON and the Hon. SAMUEL M. SHORTRIDGE, representing the people of this State in the Senate of the United States, to support the farm relief measure which has been enacted by the House of Representatives, and to use every honorable means to prevent the adoption of any amendment to the bill pending before the Senate, which would deny the same fair rights and privileges of farm relief to the growers and producers of fruits and vegetables as are to be accorded to all other agricultural industries; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly is hereby directed to transmit by telegraph, forthwith upon its adoption, copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Senators and Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States.

EDGAR C. LEVEY,
Speaker of the Assembly.

Attest:

ARTHUR A. OHNIMUS,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE,
ASSEMBLY CHAMBER,
FORTY-EIGHTH SESSION,
Sacramento.

Assembly Joint Resolution 19

Chapter 74

Assembly Joint Resolution 19, relative to Federal legislation for the building and maintenance of highways over public lands and Federal reservations

Whereas more than two-fifths of the area of the State of California still remains with the Federal Government as unreserved or unappropriated public land, nontaxable Indian lands, and other Federal reservations; and

Whereas these lands are not subject to taxation, and whereas the construction and maintenance of highways through and across these areas should be an obligation of the Federal Government requiring no financial cooperation on the part of the State or its subdivisions: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the California representatives in the Congress of the United States be, and are hereby, requested to actively support legislation which will provide for appropriations by the Federal Government with which to build and maintain highways through and across unappropriated or unreserved public lands and other Federal reservations; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Member of the Seventy-first Congress from the State of California.

EDGAR C. LEVEY,
Speaker of the Assembly.

Attest:

ARTHUR A. OHNIMUS,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration:

CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE,
ASSEMBLY CHAMBER,
FORTY-EIGHTH SESSION,
Sacramento.

Assembly Joint Resolution 11

Chapter 95

Assembly Joint Resolution 11, relative to restricted immigration

Whereas the legislature of this State has consistently urged adherence by the United States to a policy of restricted immigration; and

Whereas the present absence of restriction and supervision of immigration across the southern boundary line of the United States, opens the door annually to thousands of citizens of the Republic of Mexico, to large numbers of citizens of nations under the quota who would otherwise be excluded, and to many aliens ineligible to citizenship; and

Whereas the standard of living of the great mass of citizens of the Republic of Mexico is such that no good reason exists why the citizens thereof should be given preference as to entry into the United States over the peoples of the European stocks from which the great majority of American citizens are descended; and

Whereas the influx of laborers across the Mexican border causes unfair and unjust competition to American labor, and at the same time abrogates and nullifies the beneficial results to be expected from a national policy of restrictive immigration; and

Whereas the continued unrestricted inflow of Mexican people and the rate of increase of those already here, mean the gradual replacement of the American people by those of Mexican blood; and indicate that in the near future the populations of the Southern and Western States of the United States will become predominantly Mexican: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the legislature of this State protests against a continuance of the present unrestricted immigration from the Republic of Mexico; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully petitioned and urgently requested promptly to provide legislation placing the Republic of Mexico within the provisions of the restrictive immigration laws of the United States and providing a proper annual immigration quota therefor; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of California.

EDGAR C. LEVEY,
Speaker of the Assembly.

Attest:

ARTHUR A. OHNIMUS,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE,
ASSEMBLY CHAMBER,
FORTY-EIGHTH SESSION,
Sacramento.

Assembly Joint Resolution 15

Chapter 81

Assembly Joint Resolution 15, relative to memorializing and petitioning Congress to enact legislation for the restriction of Filipino immigration

Whereas the policy of unrestricted immigration as an aid to cheap labor has had a tendency toward destruction of American ideals and American racial unity; and

Whereas this policy has tended to exploit the negroes, the Japanese, and the Hindus, resulting in their regulation or exclusion; and

Whereas Filipinos have not been among those excluded under the immigration laws of the United States in accordance with our national policy of restrictive immigration; and

Whereas the present absence of restriction on immigration from the Philippine Islands opens the door annually to thousands of Filipinos, causing unjust and unfair competition to American labor, and nullifying the beneficial results to be expected from a national policy of restrictive immigration: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California earnestly petitions Congress to enact legislation which will restrict immigration from the Philippine Islands; and which will prevent all Filipinos entering the United States who are afflicted with communicable diseases; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be, and he is hereby, directed to send copies of this resolution to each Member of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States.

Speaker of the Assembly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I present a memorial to the Congress of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Florida requesting that legislation be enacted to place the uncompleted portions of the Gulf Coast Highway in the Federal 7 per cent system of highways. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without the accompanying map and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 18

A memorial to the Congress of the United States, requesting that legislation be enacted by said Congress to place the uncompleted portions of the Gulf Coast Highway in the Federal 7 per cent system of highways

Whereas the Gulf Coast Highway, or State Roads Nos. 10 and 15, traverses the Gulf coast of the State of Florida, touching and connecting the deep-water ports of said coast; and

Whereas, by reason of its location, it is a highway of outstanding importance to the Nation as a military road, and in the event of war would furnish access to all the deep-water ports of the Gulf coast of Florida, so as to furnish ports of embarkation, mobilization, and source of supply; and

Whereas the Federal 7 per cent system as it relates to Florida does not include the said highway: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Florida, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, memorialized and earnestly solicited to take such steps and enact such legislation as will include in the Federal 7 per cent system of highways in this State that road popularly known as the Gulf Coast Highway, extending from St. Petersburg, in Pinellas County, to Pensacola, in Escambia County, following the Gulf coast of said State, and along the routes of State Roads Nos. 10 and 15, and such other and further legislation as may be necessary to authorize and direct the United States Bureau of Public Roads to participate in the construction of the uncompleted portions of said highway; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted by the secretary of state, and under the great seal of the State, to the Secretary of War, with the request that he approve and concur in the request herein made; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial, under the great seal of the State, be transmitted by the secretary of state to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress, to the Vice President of the United States as President of the United States Senate, and to each of the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives from Florida, as Members of the said Congress; be it further

Resolved, That a map of the State of Florida, showing the location of Roads Nos. 10 and 15, and indicating the uncompleted sections of these roads, and also showing the deep-water ports reached by the Gulf Coast Highway, accompany this memorial.

Approved by the governor, May 31, 1929.

STATE OF FLORIDA,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, H. Clay Crawford, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 18, as passed by the legislature, session 1929, approved by the governor, and filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida, at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 1st day of June, A. D. 1929.

[SEAL.] H. CLAY CRAWFORD,
Secretary of State.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire the RECORD to show that I received a resolution similar to that submitted by my colleague, but in view of the fact that he has presented it I shall withhold the memorial which was sent to me.

CONFIRMATION OF JOSEPH P. COTTON

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, from the Committee on Foreign Relations I submit a report and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration as in open executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Joseph P. Cotton, of New York, to be Undersecretary of State, vice J. Reuben Clark, jr., resigned.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Idaho if this is a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. BORAH. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the nomination as in open executive session? The Chair hears none. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed, and the President will be notified.

Mr. WHEELER subsequently said: Mr. President, this morning the name of Joseph P. Cotton to be Undersecretary of State was reported by the Foreign Relations Committee. A rather unusual practice was followed, I understand, in that when the nomination came in it was not sent to the calendar at all, but was immediately confirmed, when only a very few Senators were present. A special open executive session was held for the purpose of confirming him.

In view of the unusual practice that was followed in the matter and because of certain statements that have been made to me, which I think ought to be investigated before the nominee is confirmed, I ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which he was confirmed this morning, and that the nomination be brought back to the Senate and placed upon the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana desire to make a motion or a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the nomination of Joseph P. Cotton for Undersecretary of State was confirmed be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and inasmuch as the nomination has not passed out of the possession of the Senate, it will be returned to the Executive Calendar.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I should like to suggest that this is the first fruit of open executive sessions.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, in answer to what the Senator from Indiana has just stated, I simply wish to say that we are still operating under the old rules of the Senate. They have not been changed, and the same thing could be done at any time.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 1374) granting a pension to Baury Bradford Richardson; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO TARIFF BILL—GIVING OF BOND BY OWNER OR MASTER OF VESSEL UNDER SECTION 3115 OF THE REVISED STATUTES

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 2667, the tariff revision bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, to Senate bill 151, which proposes to repeal the national-origins provision of the immigration act of 1924. I ask that the amendment may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

In connection with the amendment I should also like to have printed in the RECORD a table showing the quotas as they would appear if the amendment should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Without objection, the amendment will be received, printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Immigration, and, without objection, the paper referred to will also be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment and table referred to are as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That subdivision (b) of section 11 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'(b) The annual quota of any nationality for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1929, and for each fiscal year thereafter, shall be (1) a number which bears the same ratio to 150,000 as the number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920 having that national origin (ascertained as hereinafter provided in this section) bears to the total number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920, or (2) 2 per cent of the number of foreign-born individuals of such nationality resident in continental United States as determined by the United States census of 1890. To determine which of the foregoing methods is applicable in fixing the quota of any nation, the method which produces the lesser quota shall be employed, and such lesser quota shall be the annual quota for such nation in each instance, but the minimum quota of any nationality shall be 100.'

"SEC. 2. Subdivision (c) of section 12 of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'(c) Such officials shall, jointly, report annually to the President the quota of each nationality under subdivision (b) of section 11, together with the statements, estimates, and revisions provided for in this section. The President shall proclaim and make known the quotas so reported on or before the 1st day of July, 1929, and on or before the 1st day of April in each year thereafter, and thereafter such quotas shall continue except as otherwise provided in this act, with the same effect as if specifically stated herein, and shall be final and conclusive for every purpose.'"

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to amend the immigration act of 1924 in respect of the numerical limitations."

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Delaware whether the amendment which he has just offered relates to the national origins bill, which, if the motion submitted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] should prevail, would then come before the Senate?

Mr. HASTINGS. The amendment relates to that bill.

Mr. KING. If the motion to discharge the committee should prevail, and a motion should then prevail to take up the bill, would the Senator desire the amendment which is offered to be before the committee or would he not prefer it to be here on the table, so that he could offer it as an amendment?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am satisfied to have the amendment go to the committee, with the hope and belief that the committee may adopt it as a substitute for the other bill.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator that if the motion to discharge the committee shall prevail, I think it is the purpose of the Senator from North Dakota, and those who have associated themselves with him, to press for consideration the measure which will then be before the Senate?

Mr. HASTINGS. I understand that I should then have an opportunity to offer my amendment as a substitute for the bill?

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly. The only point that I had in mind was whether the Senator desired his amendment to be before the committee, in view of the parliamentary situation and in view of the fact that if the motion to discharge the committee shall prevail, I think, an effort will be made to have the Senate consider the entire question.

Mr. HASTINGS. I prefer to have the amendment before the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Utah that, as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] has submitted an amendment, of course, he will have the right to offer the amendment at any time.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly he could offer it even if the measure were before the committee or he could offer a similar amendment here.

Mr. HASTINGS. I desire that the committee should have an opportunity to consider the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Immigration.

WESTERN STATE ENGINEERS

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I present the manuscript of the First Annual Conference of the Association of the Western State Engineers, held in Salt Lake City, Utah, on October 29, 30, and 31, 1928, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view of its being printed as a public document.

The Association of Western State Engineers includes the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, and Wyoming. These are the States in which lie so much water yet to be used in irrigation and in the development of power. The adjudication and allocation of the waters in these States, including as they do the Boulder Canyon Dam project, constitute one of the most complex problems in western development.

The carefully prepared papers which were presented by the State engineers, and which were included in the report of the conference, together with the accompanying discussion, make available for the first time valuable data, information, and constructive suggestions which, if given a wide circulation, will prove very helpful to the Government and to the States in developing plans for the most effective utilization of their respective water resources.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the manuscript will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the North American Review for June entitled "The Farce of Enforcement," by Courtlandt Nicoll, a former member of the State Senate of New York.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FARCE OF ENFORCEMENT

By Courtlandt Nicoll

(The author, a prominent New York lawyer and former State senator, played a leading part in organizing the much-discussed committee of legal volunteers, which offers free legal aid to defendants coming under Senator WESLEY L. JONES'S drastic prohibition enforcement law. This action has been paralleled in other cities, has been widely assailed by dry leaders, and has added new fuel to the ever-increasing flames of prohibition controversy. Mr. Nicoll here explains his motives, suggesting that the Jones law is one of the most effective steps yet taken for the eventual nullification of the eighteenth amendment.)

"Soon the persecution itself, as is generally the case, caused the crime to spread, and it appeared in new forms. * * * For many of each sex and of every age and rank are and will continue to be suspected. The mischief has spread, not only through the cities but also through the villages and open country."

Familiar as they seem, the words quoted above were not taken from any contemporary report on prohibition conditions. They were written eighteen and a quarter centuries ago. They are extracts from a letter sent by Pliny, Governor of Bithynia, to the Emperor Trajan, asking his advice on the "enforcement" problem, in the year A. D. 104. The crime to which they refer is Christianity!

Though written so long ago, this correspondence is interesting in the light of present events. Pliny wants to know how far he should go in enforcing the law. He explains that, although he has inquired into the matter with some care and has tried to obtain "the real truth by putting to the torture two maidens, who are called deaconesses," he could not discover that the Christians did anything wrong, and that at worst they were but subject to a "perverse and excessive superstition." He states that he was, therefore, most reluctant to punish them, unless clearly convinced of their guilt in each case.

The Emperor's reply contains a valuable lesson in humanity to many who call themselves Christians. After complimenting Pliny on his attitude, and warning him to pay no attention to anonymous accusations, he says, "They [the Christians] must not be sought after."

To-day, with our land filled with Government spies, with its agents provocateurs, informers and stool pigeons trying to "seek after" and secure the harsh punishment of those who, like the Christians of antiquity, have violated the law but in doing so have done nothing wrong or dangerous to others, how calm and Christian seems the advice of the pagan Emperor!

We Americans like to see our moral precepts in the criminal law. We hang Roosevelt's words, "Hit the line hard, but play the game fair," in our boys' rooms and then amend the penal law of New York to provide that any player on a professional team who "throws" a game, shall be guilty of a felony. "So dear to heaven is saintly chastity;" consequently, illicit love is made a misdemeanor in Pennsylvania, and also in New York if either party is married. "Be ye temperate in all things;" and we have the Jones law which provides that the penalty imposed for each offense shall be a fine not to exceed $10,000 or imprisonment not to exceed five years, or both.

Excellent as is the purpose of these statutes, they completely miss their aim because they represent attempts to accomplish by criminal law results which can not be attained by that means. Though occasionally used for blackmailing purposes, most of such laws are innocuous. No serious attempt to enforce them is made. They lie quietly in the penal codes of the several States, to be looked at like mottoes on the wall, stating our moral ambitions, but not to be taken too seriously.

When we try to take them seriously and enforce them, as in the case of the national prohibition act, the effort brings more evils in its train than the statute was designed to cure. Sportsmanship, clean living, and temperance can not be ensured by penal statute. The Federal Government was not created to be a moral policeman, and the criminal law is solely to protect society by punishing acts which are universally condemned as immoral, or are necessarily dangerous to the well-being of another, or of his property. When the Federal Government steps out of bounds and tries in an alien sphere to enforce moral reforms by penal legislation, it makes a double error, and consequently, a double failure.

In Christian countries, at least, the moderate use of intoxicants is not universally condemned as immoral, nor is it so dangerous to the rights of others as to be generally regarded in the civilized world as warranting penal legislation wholly prohibiting traffic in liquor.

The eighteenth amendment and the national prohibition statute are examples of an effort to stop by penal law acts which many people wish to commit and which in themselves are not immoral or inherently dangerous to others.

History is strewn with the wrecks of such legislation, and shows no examples of its success, except for a limited period, in a restricted area, under military control. I have already referred to Christianity, which was a "bootleg" religion until the ban against it was lifted by Constantine in 311 A. D. Other instances are the laws against heresy, those against witchcraft, and the numerous "blue laws" which still encumber the statute books of many of the States.

American history furnishes two interesting examples of the failure of these efforts, each of which bears a close constitutional and legal analogy to the present prohibition situation.

The first of these was the effort to enforce the provisions of the Federal Constitution regarding the return of fugitive slaves (Art. IV, sec. 2, par. 3). Here we had a constitutional provision expressly declared by the Supreme Court to be "a fundamental article without the adoption of which the Union could not have been formed." (Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 539, p. 612.) After unavailing efforts to secure the enforcement of this constitutional provision the question was finally thought settled by the adoption of the great enforcement act of 1850, providing in detail the machinery and method of its enforcement by the Federal courts in strict conformity with the Constitution of the United States. The act is known in history as the fugitive slave law.

Everything that is said to-day of the necessity of obeying the law because it is the law was said in the decade prior to the Civil War in regard to the necessity of supporting the fugitive slave law. Movements for "law enforcement" were started by leaders in religion, business, and the professions.

At the great "enforcement meeting" held in 1850 at New York Daniel Webster declared that the law, though not perfect, was the law of the land and must be enforced. "No man," he cried, "has a right to set up, or to affect to set up, his own conscience as above the law." After the rescue of a negro from a United States marshal in Boston, President Fillmore, on February 18, 1851, issued a proclamation "calling on all well-disposed citizens to rally to the support of the laws of this country," and addressed a special message to Congress on the subject, in which he said that, so far as depended on him, "the law shall be faithfully executed, * * * and to this end I am prepared to exercise, whenever it may become necessary, the power constitutionally vested in me, to the fullest extent." In the case of Ableman v. Booth (21 How. [U. S.] 506) the Supreme Court took a hand in the matter, declaring that "it is among the first and highest duties of a citizen * * * to yield a ready obedience to the law" (p. 525). Both political platforms in 1852 contained "law enforcement" planks, the Democratic plank declaring:

"The statute, being designed to carry out an express provision of the Constitution, can not, with fidelity thereto, be repealed or so changed as to destroy or impair its efficiency. * * *"

This declaration was received with such uproarious enthusiasm by the convention that it had to be read twice.

But "enforcement" had no better success in those years than it has to-day. People in the Northern States thought the acts prohibited by the fugitive slave law neither wrong nor injurious and openly violated it. As to-day, Members of Congress privately violated the law to which they gave their support in public. I quote from The Anti-Slavery Crusade, by May (Yale University Press, 1920, p. 135): "The Ohio Senator, who, in his lofty preserve at the Capitol of his country, could discourse eloquently of his readiness to keep faith with the South in the matter of the faithful execution of the fugitive slave law, became, when at home with his family, a flagrant violator of the law."

In the South, of course, where the law was but the expression of public opinion, it worked smoothly and well, but the inability of the Federal Government to enforce it roused the ire of the slave States. "Worthless," "impotent," "a nuisance," were some of the epithets hurled at Washington by the law-abiding South.

Following the Civil War came the second great effort to enforce constitutional provisions by Federal laws penalizing acts which many considered neither wrong nor injurious. By the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments the negroes were guaranteed civil and political rights equal in all respects to those of the white inhabitants. The efforts of the Government to secure these rights culminated in the statute known as the enforcement act of 1870. Senator Schurz explained the purpose of this act, as follows: "In other words, neither a State nor an individual shall deprive any citizen, on account of race or color, of the free exercise of his right to participate in the functions of self-government, and the National Government assumes the duty to prevent the commission of the crime and to correct the consequences when committed."

In the years when the Federal authorities tried to enforce this law, with the aid, by the way, of the Army, the country passed through another era of "law-enforcement" meetings, clogged court calendars, prosecutions ending nowhere, and a general spirit of lawlessness in those parts of the country where the law was not supported by public opinion.

Since 1878, when President Hayes withdrew the Army from the Southern States, no serious effort has been made by the Federal Government to enforce these provisions of its own Constitution. The brave words of the Republican platform of 1876 pledging the party to secure "to every citizen complete liberty and exact equality in the exercise of all civil, political, and public rights" had, by the year 1928, dwindled to a plank pledging it to discourage negro lynchings!

And, curiously enough, the most ardent champion of "law enforcement" in our decade explicitly approved the nullification of these constitutional amendments. William Jennings Bryan declared in New York in 1908, "The white man of the South has disfranchised the negro in self-protection, and there is not a Republican in the North who would not have done the same thing under the same circumstances."

"No man has the right to set up, or affect to set up, his own conscience as above the law."

Looking back through history, would the people who hold this point of view to-day have been for "law enforcement" when Christianity was a crime? Would they have been for the enforcement of the laws against heresy and witchcraft? Would they have denied to America the right to independence? Would they have sent the slave back to his master, or shackled the South with negro domination, supported by military power? I think not.

As Seward replied to Webster, "There is a higher law than the Constitution."

What is going to happen? More laws? Larger appropriations? Heavier penalties? They amount to nothing. "It is useless," as Calvin Coolidge said, "to attempt to dragoon the body when the need is to appeal to the soul," and the soul can not be terrorized into obedience, or persuaded to it, by the plea that it must uphold the law. As Pliny pointed out, "persecution * * * causes a crime to spread." People who are conscious of no moral wrong resent being held in restraint, and intelligence revolts at the command to consider acts wrong or harmful when the common experience of mankind proves that they are neither.

The fact is that the Federal Government, in prohibition matters, is like a huge battleship in shallow waters, manned by a disloyal crew and engaged in a guerrilla warfare against an outwardly friendly but secretly rebellious people. Her fighting ability is not increased by heavier armor, larger cannon, additions to her personnel, or by hoisting more flags, though they lessen her maneuvering ability. Once in a while one of her great guns goes off, hits the mark, and a man or woman goes to jail. But mighty as she is, she is powerless, because not used for the purpose for which she was constructed.

The first thing to do is to get the ship into deep water again; that is, to take the National Government out of the shoals of trying to secure an ambitious moral reform by the enforcement of a criminal law enacted by a government of limited power. When the temperate people are convinced that their objective can not be obtained by Federal penal legislation, no matter how many laws they pass or how severe they make them, we will have accomplished the first step toward a reform of the present conditions.

Fortunately, the Jones law, placing heavier penalties on certain acts made criminal by the national prohibition statute, has created a situation whereby the country may be impressed with the futility of the whole effort. Raising the penalties has taken the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicants out of the misdemeanor class and placed them in the class with such felonies as arson and manslaughter in the lower degrees. Under the Federal Constitution, as well as under those of most of the States, persons accused of such serious offenses must go through the formality of a grand jury indictment, followed by a trial before a petit jury of 12 men, and a unanimous verdict is necessary to a conviction. (United States Constitution, Art. III, and Amendments V and VI.)

The sixth amendment also provides that any person accused of a crime shall have other important rights, among which is the right to "have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

Taking advantage of these provisions promptly after the Jones law was approved, I organized with several other lawyers in New York a committee or group of legal volunteers. Our purpose was to see that those who under the Jones law faced loss of citizenship, in addition to heavy fines and imprisonment, should have that legal assistance which they might not otherwise be able to obtain, but which is expressly guaranteed by the Constitution. When a man who in violating the law has done no wrong, inflicted no injury on another, can not pay a lawyer to defend himself, we supply one for him without charge from our list of volunteers.

We are not proceeding in opposition to the Constitution, but in direct conformity with it. Our appeal is only to the courts and juries established by the Constitution, but we propose to see that the legal and constitutional rights of those committed to our care are adequately protected, and in so doing strike a telling blow at the hypocrisy and corruption that masquerade under the name of prohibition.

The grand juries before which these accused individuals come for indictment and the petit juries before which they must come for trial are composed of ordinary citizens. Some of them buy intoxicants, others drink them whenever they have a chance, and still others, who neither buy nor drink liquor, have among their acquaintances many reputable men and women who do so without being conscious of moral guilt.

I have great confidence in these juries. They are the bulwarks of liberty. It was due to the failure of the grand juries to indict and of petit juries to convict that the laws against heresy and witchcraft became obsolete long before their eventual repeal. The inability of the Federal prosecutors to secure indictments and convictions under "the enforcement act of 1870" resulted in making the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments impotent to accomplish the results for which they were intended. When in England the theft of anything of the value of 1 shilling or over was punishable by death, it was the petit juries which secured the repeal of these cruel provisions by repeatedly finding that the property stolen was not worth that much, irrespective of how great its actual value might be. It is recorded that in one case, when exactly 1 shilling in currency was stolen, the jury found the value to be 11 pence ha'penny, just under the limit, thus cheating the gallows of their victim.

A fundamental part of the judicial system, the jury is a law unto itself, and gives expression to the opinion of the average man on what is right and what is wrong. It can not be disciplined for failure to follow the guidance of the prosecuting attorney or the suggestions of the court. Few juries, I am confident, will deprive a man of his citizenship and place him in jeopardy of a large fine and a long term in prison, when, judged by the common standards of mankind, he has done nothing wrong or dangerous to another. They are fully aware that "there is a higher law than the Constitution"—the law of humanity and common sense. They realize that the only reason the defendant stands before them charged with crime is that on one or two occasions he failed to distinguish between an individual like themselves and a spy in the employ of the Government.

For, unlike action under most of the criminal laws, there are practically no prosecutions in prohibition cases except on manufactured evidence. By this I do not mean that the evidence is untrue, but practically always it is the agents of the Government who cause the crime to be committed of which they subsequently accuse the defendant. Moreover, if asked their name and business, they never tell the truth. They do not say, "We are spies employed and financed by the Government to buy liquor from you in order to obtain evidence to convict you of a felony"; they pass themselves off as one of the millions of ordinary thirsty Americans who merely want a drink. I quote from the cross-examination of a Government spy in a prohibition case in the United States Court for the Southern District of New York:

"Q. So you lied to her [the defendant], didn't you?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Most of the stories you told were untrue, weren't they?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Trying to make a criminal out of her, weren't you? Yes or no.

"A. Yes, sir."

Lying and seduction to crime are the preliminaries to a prosecution under the prohibition laws.

"But otherwise," says the prosecutor, "we could make no arrests." True enough, no doubt; but falsehood and inducing another to commit felony make an incongruous foundation for what was intended as a great moral reform; and what is more, the juries readily grasp that point.

The grand jury of Kings County, N. Y., drawn from "the City of Churches," petitioned for the repeal of the New York State enforcement act when it was in effect on account of its corrupting influence. So far no similar action on behalf of the Federal grand juries has been drawn to my attention, but there are rumors that enforcement officials are not having a happy time with their cases before the juries in many parts of the country.

With the failure of the grand juries to indict, or a series of acquittals by the petit juries, the eighteenth amendment and its "enforcement acts" will join the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments and the "enforcement act of 1870" in our museum of legal history. They may be used intermittently for blackmail, but the wholesale hypocrisy and corruption that are the necessary by-products of a great effort to secure moral reform by criminal law will disappear, and America will eventually be free to follow the lead of other temperate nations in the treatment of problems created by the ever-existing traffic in intoxicants.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. NYE obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen	Gillett	McNary	Smoot
Ashurst	Glenn	Metcalf	Steck
Barkley	Goff	Moses	Steiwer
Bingham	Greene	Norbeck	Swanson
Blease	Harris	Norris	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Harrison	Nye	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Hastings	Oddie	Townsend
Broussard	Hatfield	Overman	Trammell
Burton	Hawes	Patterson	Tydings
Capper	Hayden	Phipps	Tyson
Connally	Heflin	Pine	Vandenberg
Couzens	Howell	Pittman	Wagner
Cutting	Johnson	Ransdell	Walcott
Dale	Kean	Reed	Walsh, Mass.
Deneen	Keyes	Sackett	Walsh, Mont.
Dill	King	Sheppard	Warren
Edge	La Follette	Shortridge	Waterman
Fletcher	McKellar	Simmons	Watson
Frazier	McMaster	Smith	Wheeler

Mr. HEFLIN. My colleague the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

AMENDMENT OF TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has a measure in charge which, I understand, will not provoke any debate. Therefore I yield to him with that understanding, in order that he may present it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 3083, which was up for consideration last night, but was not passed because of the necessity for securing certain information. I have that information now from the department and I shall give it to the Senate. I am quite sure that then there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, we have not yet heard in this part of the Chamber what the Senator is talking about.

Mr. SMOOT. I am asking unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of taking up House bill 3083, to amend subsection (a) of section 26 of the trading with the enemy act. Last evening in the discussion there were a number of questions asked which I could not answer in detail. I submitted those questions to the Treasury Department and I have a report in detail from that department. I am quite sure that when it is submitted to the Senate there will be no objection to the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. The junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is, I understand, interested in the measure. He is not at this moment in the Chamber. Is he satisfied with the information the Senator now has?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not seen the junior Senator from Montana, but I have submitted the information to the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and explained the items in question.

Mr. HEFLIN. As I understand, the Senator's investigation of the matter since yesterday convinces him that under the House bill which he asks unanimous consent that the Senate shall now consider, the measure will not result in the payment of any interest whatsoever by the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. That is absolutely correct. I have all the information in detail and I would like to place it in the RECORD.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will have it put in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 3083?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3083) to amend subsection (a) of section 26 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended by the settlement of war claims act of 1928, so as to authorize the allocation of the unallocated interest fund in accordance with the records of the Alien Property Custodian, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second sentence of subsection (a) of section 26 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended by the settlement of war claims act of 1928, is amended by striking out the words "average rate of," so that the sentence will read: "Such allocation shall be based upon the earnings (determined by the Secretary of the Treasury) on the total amounts deposited under section 12."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would like to have Senators now give attention to the measure. I secured this information from the Treasury Department this morning, and not only that, but I have checked it up myself as to dates, and so forth.

During the discussion in the Senate yesterday some question was raised as to the practice of the office of the Alien Property Custodian in depositing funds in the banks, and also as to the amount of interest which was being paid upon the funds deposited in the Treasury by the Alien Property Custodian.

I am advised that each of the Alien Property Custodians—Mr. Garvin, Mr. Palmer, and Mr. Miller—followed the practice of depositing with banks throughout the country funds coming into their hands. The interest upon these deposits has been paid to the Alien Property Custodian. This practice, however, ceased when Mr. Hicks became Alien Property Custodian and since that time all funds are deposited at once in the Treasury.

The pending bill, however, has nothing to do with this situation. It relates solely to the disposition of the interest earned upon the funds deposited in the Treasury by the Alien Property Custodian. These funds were invested by the Secretary of the Treasury in bonds and notes and other securities of the United States. Prior to March 4, 1923, the earnings upon these investments remained in the Treasury and were reinvested. After that date they have been paid directly into the trust and returned to the owners, under the Winslow Act.

The pending bill relates solely to the earnings accumulated prior to March 4, 1923, and the earnings upon those earnings down to the present time. The bill provides for the proper distribution of these earnings. It costs the United States nothing. The earnings belong to the owners of the property and must be distributed to them.

For the information of the Senate, I will state that the average rate of earnings by quarters is as follows: For the quarter ending March 15, 1927, 4.155 per cent; September 15, 1927, 3.535 per cent; March 15, 1928, 3.627 per cent; September 15, 1928, 3.496 per cent; March 15, 1929, 2.825 per cent.

Of course, the reduction of the amount of earnings has depended upon the price of the bonds at the time they were invested and the income from those bonds on the basis of the price paid. I wish to say further that in the Alien Property Custodian act as it passed the Senate it was provided that the interest should begin at the time the money was deposited with the Alien Property Custodian. This will make no difference whatever as to that, and what I have stated is all the change proposed to be made in the existing law. I hope that the bill may be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1648) to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. TREADWAY, Mr. BACHARACH, Mr. GARNER, and Mr. COLLIER were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

AMENDMENT OF SECOND LIBERTY BOND ACT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1648) to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. WATSON, Mr. REED, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. HARRISON conferees on the part of the Senate.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF THE IMMIGRATION ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 37) submitted by Mr. NYE April 23, 1929, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 151) to repeal the national-origins provisions of the immigration act of 1924.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article which appeared in last Sunday's New York Times, by Guy Irving Burch, on the subject of national origins.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The article is as follows:

[From the New York Times, June 2, 1929]

NATIONAL-ORIGINS PLAN HELD TO BE SOUNDEST IN PRINCIPLE—MODIFICATION OF PRESIDENT'S POSITION IS CITED AS INDICATING FALLACY OF THE "ALIEN AND ARBITRARY" 1890 SYSTEM

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

We have just finished reading Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart's excellent article on the National Origins Immigration Law, in the June issue of Current History. Professor Hart has given a very comprehensive picture of immigration restriction in this country, but as the national origins and 1890 basis of restriction are rival plans before Congress and the American people, we had hoped that the professor would give more space to a consideration of the relative merits of these two plans by going into the official documentary evidence as given in the most recent hearings before the Senate.

In the second paragraph on page 481 of Current History, Professor Hart tells us that the 1921 law limited "immigration from each country to 3 per cent of the people born in each country who were living in the United States at the time of the census of 1910." The professor continues: "In 1924 this percentage was changed to a basis of such persons enumerated in the United States in 1890." Here he says "a basis," but he does not tell us that the 3 per cent was also changed to 2 per cent.

CALCULATION OR ESTIMATE

There are certain other points in Professor Hart's article that might tend to confuse those less familiar with immigration restriction than himself. Let us consider one of the most important. Professor Hart says:

"The difficulty of the national-origins plan is that it is necessarily based not on recorded numbers but on calculations."

To grasp the full significance of this statement it should be remembered that there are two rival plans before Congress for consideration, and that evidence against one is, in an indirect way, evidence for the other. Now, if it is fair to say that the national-origins plan is based upon calculations, it is also fair to say that the 1890 plan is based upon estimates. Perhaps it would be fairer to both plans to say that there is an element of calculation in the one and an element of estimate in the other, or to use the words of the chairman of the committee of experts, "there is a pretty large element of estimate in the 1890 basis." (Senate hearings, 1928, p. 12.)

THE QUESTION OF ACCURACY

But if we wish to get at the real basis of both plans it is only fair to state that the 1890 plan is based exclusively upon 8,000,000 foreign born in this country in 1890, while the national-origins plan is based upon 89,000,000 both native and foreign born white population in this country in 1920. From these facts it should be evident to all that the former plan is alien in character and arbitrary in principle, and that the latter plan would have to be ridiculously inaccurate not to represent the American people better than the former. But we have the qualified expert testimony of Samuel W. Boggs, secretary of the quota board, that the national-origins quotas "are, taken as a whole, at least as accurate as the present quotas. Many of the quotas are more accurate." (Senate hearings, 1929, p. 8.)

We also have the testimony of Dr. Joseph A. Hill, chairman of the committee of experts appointed by the three Secretaries to work out both quota systems, "that no proposition has been brought to my attention that seems to me fairer than this one of national origin." And when Doctor Hill was asked if the 1890 basis reflected with "any accuracy the proportion of nationalities that now exist in the United States," he answered: "No, indeed; it does not." (Senate hearings, 1928, p. 17.)

APPROVED BY SCIENTISTS

Nor does the qualified expert testimony end here. In 1927, 47 of the leading scientists of this country signed a memorial to the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives which urged the prompt putting into effect of the national-origins provision because it "is sound in principle and fair to all elements in the population." (Senate hearings, 1929, pp. 160–161.)

Against this testimony and the evidence in the Senate hearings we have, however, the authority of Mr. Hoover, who was one of the three Secretaries who appointed the committee of experts. But as it was brought out in the Senate hearings this year (p. 17) by Mr. Boggs, the three Secretaries "never sat with our committee," and thus Mr. Hoover is not qualified as an expert on this problem. That Mr. Hoover now realizes this fact and wishes to modify his position as gracefully as possible is shown by the fact that he no longer recommends repeal of national origins but merely suspension, and has recently kept silent even about suspension. Certainly Mr. Hoover has a right to modify his position on this subject, because even Prof. Roy L. Garis, the author of the 1890 plan, has now come over to national origins. One of the greatest services Congress could do for Mr. Hoover and the American people is to let the alien and arbitrary 1890 plan die a natural death to be superseded by the national-origins provision, which "is sound in principle and fair to all elements in the population."

GUY IRVING BURCH.

MAY 28, 1929.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, on the day before yesterday when discussing national origins as the basis of immigration quotas, I recited a comparison of the quotas which are being granted to the various quota countries under the prevailing basis of immigration quotas with that which would exist were the national-origins clause to be accepted and become effective on July 1 of this year, as it will in the event of the failure of Congress to respond to the wishes of the President and to repeal it. However, there has not been incorporated in the RECORD during the course of my remarks the actual table showing that comparison, and I ask that that table may be incorporated in the RECORD at this point.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask the Senator if he has reference to the same table as the one on the wall of the Chamber?

Mr. NYE. No; the table to which I refer shows the comparison of quotas that would prevail under the existing basis and under the proposed national-origins basis for all the countries that are involved in immigration quotas. The table on the wall concerns only 8 or 10 countries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota that the table to which he refers be incorporated in the RECORD?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Table showing immigration quotas under the 1890 basis, now operating, and the national-origins basis which will become operative unless repealed

	1890 basis, now operating	National-origins basis [1]

[1] According to latest official estimates.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, on Monday when discussing this question I made reference to the suggestion of hyphenated Americanism that has entered into the propaganda in support of the national-origins clause, and gave notice that I should desire to speak upon that subject on the following day. The situation yesterday, however, did not offer an opportunity for me to continue my remarks, and so at this time I want to state that the propaganda which has been sent forth endeavors to make it appear that many of those, indeed I might say almost all of those, who are advocates of the repeal of the national-origins clause of the immigration act are not of a high patriotic type of American citizens, rather that they are hyphenated Americans. I say that to question one's patriotism in this controversy is nothing short of cowardly. I do not say that such charges have been made here on the floor, but in the propaganda which has been disseminated they have been repeatedly made. I have before me an advertisement taken from a recent edition, the edition of May 21, of the Chicago Tribune over the signature of the Immigration Restriction Association of America, and I want to read from that advertisement one paragraph, as follows:

The bulk of the opposition to national origins was and is of hyphenated inspiration and organization. Two kinds of hyphenates are involved—(1) those opposed to all restrictions who want to knock out national origins as the first step toward breaking down all restriction, and (2) those somewhat unassimilated groups who desire to retain for the nation of their derivation the special privileges they are enjoying under the present temporary 1890 "foreign-born" (and quite un-American) quotas. Both groups are people whose bodies are in America but whose hearts are in Europe.

Then I find at the end of the same advertisement this language:

How long will you tolerate foreign propaganda as an agency in molding American legislation? The time has come for the American people to end hyphenism.

Let Washington hear from the American people—

I want to remind the Senate that this advertisement appears in the Chicago Tribune, an Illinois paper—

Let Washington hear from the American people. Write or wire to-day the President of the United States and your Senators, CHARLES S. DENEEN and OTIS F. GLENN, that you are opposed to the repeal or suspension of the national-origins clause of the immigration act of 1924.

Keep America American!

Mr. President, I repeat that in many respects propaganda of this kind is cowardly, because it is a well-known fact that there are many men and many women and many organizations whose Americanism is not in any degree questioned, who are heart and soul in this cause to repeal the national-origins clause in the immigration act of 1924.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. GLENN. How large an advertisement is that which the Senator from North Dakota has just read?

Mr. NYE. It is at least a full half page.

Mr. GLENN. The net result, so far as I am concerned, has been, I think, about four letters from Illinois.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator. What he says is highly complimentary to the people of Illinois who are reading this sort of propaganda.

I might call attention to the fact that an officer of the association represented here is one Demarest Lloyd, who played a rather prominent part in the hearings conducted by the Committee on Immigration of the Senate; and it is rather interesting to follow Mr. Lloyd's argument as advanced in the course of his presentation to the Senate committee. On pages 31, 32, and 33 of the record of that hearing I find at various places this manner of language. The chairman asked Mr. Lloyd:

Do you not think that our immigration law at present has been generally acquiesced in?

Mr. LLOYD. I do not think, sir, this question has been at all understood. I think there are a great many people who are opposed to the national-origins basis, who are temporarily lending lip service to the 1890 basis; but in a great many instances those people have the objective of breaking down restriction, and as soon as you get the national origins out of the way, then those people who are rendering lip service to the 1890 basis will turn and attack it on those grounds I have mentioned.

Again, I find him saying:

We are just simply asking that this patriotic law be put into effect, because we regard that as best for restriction, and restriction is best for the country, which is our only concern; and on that subject we invite comparisons with organizations which have appeared or will appear on the other side.

At which point I asked Mr. Lloyd:

Do you question the patriotism of the two late candidates for President of the United States?

Mr. Lloyd replied:

No, sir.

I asked again:

Do you not suppose there might have been some real, genuine, patriotic reason that caused them to advocate the repeal of the national-origins clause?

To which Mr. Lloyd responded:

I would not say that it was a patriotic reason.

Mr. President, the question of patriotism is involved in more issues than in this one, of course, and it is raised generally on the part of people who do not approve what others are doing. If they can not agree with what one is proposing or what one is endeavoring to accomplish, immediately it becomes the easiest thing in the world to say, "Well, his patriotism is not beyond reproach." Mr. President, I insist that those who are endeavoring to bring about the repeal of the national-origins clause of the immigration act are as patriotic as are those who insist that we must not alter, must not change, the status which will permit the national-origins provision of the immigration act to become effective on July 1 of this year.

The Immigration Restriction League, to which the Chicago Tribune advertisement to which I have just referred has further reference, is also responsible for the little folder which I have before me. It is not dated, but is a very recent argument. In it I find language further indicating the narrowness of not all of those but many of those who, like Mr. Lloyd, are insisting that we must not repeal the national-origins clause. They are exceedingly narrow when they resort to language of this kind. And I find Mr. Lloyd's name connected with this particular pamphlet, from which I continue to read:

Like thieves in the night—

ready to slay, if necessary, to accomplish their purpose of taking something that does not belong to them, so we find many of our un-Americanized residents still fighting national origins and urging its repeal, even though it is admittedly the fairest method ever devised. They would even repeal all immigration laws if connivance, political trickery, and other questionable methods could bring it about. It is the same crowd that always opposes restrictive legislation. Line them up, read their records, and you will find them to be thoroughly anti-American and proforeign on immigration matters.

I submit, Mr. President, that propaganda of that kind is cowardly, for the attempt is made to place under a cloud of suspicion those who propose to repeal the national-origins clause of the immigration act. So much for that.

I want to say now that there has been some little effort made—and it has accomplished results in some quarters, I find—to appeal to the American public and prevail upon them to believe that the national-origins clause of the immigration act is a clause which is aimed to do away with slackers here in the United States, as we came to know slackers during the late war. At page 76 of the hearings before the committee I find this language:

During the World War 2,000,000 persons resident in America of foreign birth claimed exemption under the draft because of their alienage. Yet, should we continue to base our quotas upon the foreign-born population, the countries of which these slackers are natives would be allowed to send additional immigrants to America on their account, although no account would be taken in immigration quotas of the native-born Americans who responded so admirably to the call of their country.

The same witness declared:

The issue can be brought squarely between patriotism and slackerism—shall slackerism be represented in selecting our immigration over patriotism?

So I submit again, Mr. President, that the patriotism of men who dare to speak in opposition to the retention of the national-origins clause of the immigration act is questioned.

I presume that every Member of this body has close contact with that element of people who have been brought under this cloud of suspicion. Not all Senators, however, have had the same contact with them that is afforded those of us who reside in the Northwest and have a wide acquaintance with the class of people who are either foreign born or are the children of foreign-born parents, who have gone into the Northwest and made it largely what it is to-day. Its progress, its general well-being, its development, its community life, have all been made what they are by that very element of people who are now brought under this cloud of suspicion and whose patriotism is questioned.

I had occasion 10 or 12 years ago to observe the nature and the measure of patriotism which flowed from that very class of people when their country most needed their services, and I can not recall the sacrifices that were then made, the things that were done by foreign-born parents, the sacrifices made by them and the sacrifices made by their children, without feeling that at least this charge of lack of patriotism is deserving of severe challenge.

There were slackers, Mr. President, in the late World War, but I have not seen the advocates of national origins demonstrating who they were and from what countries these slackers came during the late war. They have not endeavored to show in any sense or in any manner what specific country contributed these slackers. I insist that there were slackers in the late war, but there is nothing to demonstrate that those slackers came from the countries which are being penalized and which are being discriminated against under the national-origins clause contained within the immigration act. Until that is done let us not aim to accomplish legislation that is going to do away with slackers and is going to cut off immigration from those countries which contributed the slackers in other days.

Mr. President, if we are going to base immigration quotas upon a patriotic basis, if we are going to endeavor to accomplish limitation of immigration from slacker countries, I think it at least interesting to raise the question at this time as to what the result might have been in the late war, during the draft, had the United States declared war against Great Britain instead of against Germany. Would the proportion of slackers, or the proportion in numbers of people who were claiming exemption because of lineage, have been one iota different than it was under the circumstances that then prevailed? I believe not. If we are going to make this matter of immigration a question of patriotism, and if we are going to base immigration quotas upon figures and upon facts that are going to bring us the kind of people who have rallied most patriotically to the cause of their country in times past, then, I say, let us go back to the late war, if you will, to the World War. Let us take all the names that appear upon the rolls of the United States Army during that period. Let us trace the nativity of all of those boys, of all of those men; and I venture to say that the quotas of immigration that would be derived from such a study would be altogether different from what is disclosed under the national-origins basis of immigration quotas.

But if we are going to be really patriotic, why stop at the World War? Why not go back to that war which gave us life as a nation? Why not go back to that war which gave us origin as a nation? Why not go back to that very period when the matter of national origins first became a reality? If we do, Mr. President, if we do go back to the Revolutionary War period, and take the rolls of the Continental Army, of Washington's Army, trace the nativity of that army, and base immigration quotas upon those statistics, we are going to admit for the most part, under such a basis of quotas, Irishmen, and Irishmen alone; because the records of the Revolutionary War period disclose, if they disclose anything at all, that the people who rallied to the cause of the Colonies and who saved a prolonging of that war were the Irish people. I have figures here to-day which I want to use to demonstrate the point I am endeavoring to make.

Of course it is impossible to go back to the record of enlistments in the late war and to trace the nativity or the national origin of each one of the men who fought in that war. It is impossible for the very reason that it is impossible, and has been demonstrated to be impossible, for more than a very small part of the Members of the United States Senate to determine what their national origin is.

A very energetic newspaper correspondent some months ago, during the past winter, endeavored to ascertain the national origin of Members of this body. She waited personally upon the Members of the Senate, and could not succeed; she came nowhere near succeeding in ascertaining what the national origin of Members of this body was. And yet here we are, under the national-origins clause, attempting to determine what percentage of our population to-day traces its ancestry to this country, that country, or the other country!

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not wish to take issue with the Senator in his argument; but it seems to me that the Senator has just made a statement which contradicts a previous statement. He said a moment ago that a large number of those who saved the outcome of the Revolutionary War were Irish, or of Irish extraction. Then he said it was difficult to tell the nationality of those engaged in the Revolutionary War. It seems to me that if the figures for the Irish could be obtained, the figures for the other nationalities engaged in that struggle could also be obtained.

Mr. NYE. But, Mr. President, I have not maintained that the facts which have been dug up with relation to the Irish in the Revolutionary War are in any measure complete or in any measure accurate.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not wish to disparage or belittle the services of the Irish in that war; but I was interested in knowing how the Senator could know how one nationality had contributed to it and not know the proportion that other nationalities had contributed.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. In the latter part of the year 1778 and in the early part of the year 1779, during our American Revolution, there was dissatisfaction in England, and especially in Parliament, with reference to some of the movements of the British officers.

Severe strictures were made in Parliament against Sir William Howe, of the British forces on the American Continent, and a parliamentary investigation was had.

Joseph Galloway, who had been for some 12 years speaker of the House of Delegates or the House of Assembly of the Pennsylvania Legislature, was called upon to testify before a joint committee of the two houses of Parliament. His testimony was published in the Royal Gazette, then printed by James Rivington, printer to the King, and in the issue of the Royal Gazette of Wednesday, October 27, 1779, an original of which is in the Congressional Library, the following testimony was given by Mr. Galloway:

Q. That part of the rebel army that enlisted in the service of the Congress, were they chiefly composed of natives of America or were the greatest part of them English, Scotch, and Irish?

Mr. Galloway answered as follows:

A. The names and places of their nativity being taken down, I can answer the question with precision. There was scarcely one-fourth natives of America; about one-half Irish; and the other fourth were English and Scotch.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have upon my desk that evidence, which I had expected to offer at an opportune moment.

Mr. ASHURST. I am sorry I anticipated the Senator.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator, though, for making reference to it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. NYE. I do.

Mr. TYDINGS. I assume that General Howe did not count or know any too well the complexion of the Revolutionary Army. I suppose this was only an estimate and an opinion, not based on facts; but if I may say so rather humorously, the Irish having a fine reputation for fighting, perhaps the quality rather than the quantity of their resistance was what the general had in mind. [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, one can not go into any history of the Revolutionary War period and the make-up of the Continental Army without being convinced of the very material part played by people of Irish and by people of German extraction in that conflict and in the great emergency that existed at that time. We have the record of Thomas McKean, who participated in the signing of the Declaration of Independence. We have the records of Steuben and of De Kalb and of the many Germans who recorded their parts, and recorded them well, during that period. We have but to take the rolls of the Continental Army to see how preponderant is the element of German and Irish strains which went to make up that army.

One Member of this body the other day referred to a recent visit which he had made to Valley Forge and to the enjoyable study that he had made there of the many monuments which had been there erected, and how the names of Germans and of Irish stand out all through that great national ground, indicating the German and the Irish strength that was brought into our cause during the Revolutionary period.

It is a matter of interest, of course, to know that Washington's bodyguard during the Revolutionary period was a bodyguard of Germans who could not speak a word of English, according to one authority—who could not speak a word of English. Taking that as a record, of course, some will argue that Washington wanted a bodyguard that could not understand what was going on about him; but it seems to me that is rather far-fetched.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator must be in error in his reference to Washington's bodyguard, because I find that in a letter written on April 30, 1777, General Washington says this:

I want to form a company for my guard. In doing this I wish to be extremely cautious, because it is more than probable that, in the course of the campaign, my baggage, papers, and other matters of great public import may be committed to the sole care of these men. This being premised, in order to impress you with proper attention in the choice, I have to request that you will immediately furnish me with four men of your regiments; * * * I think it [fidelity] most likely to be found in those, who have family connections in the country. You will therefore send me none but natives and men of some property if you have them.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, that does not necessarily say that at some time or other during the course of that period Washington's bodyguard was not entirely German, and could not speak a word of English.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. NYE. I do.

Mr. TYDINGS. Undoubtedly the Senator is making a speech based upon facts, and I do not wish to question that at all; but, as one Member of the Senate, I should appreciate it, in reading over his speech afterwards, if he would insert in the RECORD the authorities for the remarks he is now making, so that we may estimate the worth of those authorities.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I shall gladly do that.

Now I turn, to show who our saviors were in the Revolutionary period, to a memorandum which I have compiled showing the part that the Irish played in the Revolutionary War.

We find that John Barry, the "Father of the American Navy," was born in Ireland.

We find, too, that Gen. Stephen Moylan, an Irishman by birth, as muster master general, or adjutant general, organized the first army of the united Colonies and helped to fit out the first armed naval force of the united Colonies. He also acted as aide to General Washington.

John Moylan, a brother of his, was commissioned clothier general during the Revolution.

Col. John Fitzgerald, an early settler of Alexandria, Va., and personal friend of Washington, was also a native of Ireland and served during the Revolutionary War as aide to the general.

Thomas Fitzsimons, a native of Limerick, Ireland, served as a captain during the Revolutionary War and was also a member of the Constitutional Convention, signed the Constitution, and became a Member of the First Congress.

Ædanus Burke, a native of Galway, Ireland, served during the Revolution with the Carolina troops and was a justice of the Supreme Court of South Carolina in 1778.

Also serving with the Continental Army were such outstanding individuals as Gen. William Irvine, a native of Ireland; Gen. John Shea, another native of Ireland; Col. Walter Stewart, a native of Ireland; Generals Morgan, Hogan, Hand, Greaton, Thomas, Maxwell, Lewis, Butler, and Sir Richard Montgomery, all of them natives of Ireland. Charles Thomson, of County Derry, Ireland, a native of that county, was the first secretary of the Continental Congress.

I turn to a compilation of the officers of the American Army and Navy of the Revolution of Irish birth or descent, and I find that something like 1,440 officers of the Revolutionary War were natives of Ireland or direct descendants of natives of Ireland.

It is not necessary to read all of those names. I will, however, state the volume from which I obtained the information. It is a volume entitled "A Hidden Phase of American History," disclosing Ireland's part in America's struggle for liberty, written by Michael J. O'Brien. I am ready to concede that a volume of that nature may be in some degree prejudiced, is quite apt to be prejudiced, and yet, if it is necessary to print the authority of those who might be prejudiced in competition and in opposition of so violent and unjustifiable a basis of immigration quotas, as is that gained under the national-origins provision, it seems to me to be quite in keeping with the situation.

Mr. President, we look upon foreigners as a people who have brought no patriotic advantage to America. We look upon foreigners as being people who never in times past have done things worth while as native Americans have done. Out of 83 Congressional Medal of Honor men in the late World War, 10 of them were foreign born. How many more of those 83 were direct descendants of foreign born I do not know, but 10 of those 83 were foreign born. One came from Serbia, one came from Finland, one came from Austria, one came from Greece, a second one came from Austria, one came from England, two came from Norway, one came from Montenegro, and one came from Holland.

Mr. President, the record that has been written by foreigners in all the great emergencies which this country has suffered is a record which is bound to win praise, and certainly ought to win consideration when we are dealing with so vital a thing as the immigration question now before us.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] made reference a moment ago to a record disclosing the number of Irish who participated in the Revolutionary War, and referred to certain testimony which had been given before the House of Commons. I have before me upon my desk a photostat from the British Royal Gazette, of Wednesday, October 27, 1779, disclosing the examination of Joseph Galloway, Esq., late speaker of the House of Assembly of Pennsylvania, before the British House of Commons in the committee on the American papers. Mr. Galloway was asked, "That part of the rebel army that enlisted in the service of the Congress, were they chiefly composed of natives of America, or were the greatest part of them English, Scotch, and Irish?" To which Mr. Galloway responded, "The names and places of their nativity being taken down, I can answer the question with precision. There were scarcely one-fourth natives of America—about one-half Irish—the other fourth were English and Scotch."

Mr. President, I submit, in conclusion of that issue, that we do well to leave that alone as a basis of our consideration in the laying of any foundation upon which we are going to base immigration quotas.

The regrettable thing to me in this entire controversy is the position taken by the American Legion and by the Daughters of the American Revolution, and other well-intended and well-intentioned patriotic organizations here in America. The attitude of the American Legion is doubly regrettable because of the lack of understanding which is so largely true of members of the Legion itself, a lack of understanding as to just what would be accomplished under immigration based upon the national-origins provision.

I have had several letters from leading men in the American Legion, seeking to show where I was in grave error in championing or having anything to do looking to the repeal of so fine a thing as the national-origins basis of immigration quotas.

I took particular pains in answering these letters, and went at length into an explanation from the record as to precisely what would be done under national origins to our immigration quotas, sending along such statements of facts as were then available, including a record of the hearings before the Senate committee, and in one case in a few days I received from the individual to whom I had written a letter apologizing for ever having asked me to do anything other than support the move to repeal the national-origins provision within the immigration act. Before this debate is over I hope to have permission to incorporate in the RECORD the letter which I wrote and the answer which I received, to which I have just referred. It is not generally known—it is not known in this body, at least it has not been until more recent days—just what national origins would accomplish. Yet we are led to believe, and there are those who would cause us to believe, that the great and fine American Legion knows just what would be done, and that they are all for the national-origins clause within the immigration act.

Mr. President, I have deep regret, too, over the position taken by the Daughters of the American Revolution in this controversy. I have seen a letter this morning written by one of the leading members of that patriotic order in Illinois which, in substance, apologizes for having recommended to some one else that national origins was the thing upon which to base immigration quotas. The writer did not realize, she said in this letter, what it was all about, and did not realize just what was going to be accomplished and what was not going to be accomplished under national origins.

These things are regrettable. The American people have not had that opportunity which they ought to have to realize, to study, and to come to appreciate just what national origins is intended to do and just what national origins would accomplish.

It is said, and with feeling in many quarters, that immigration quotas based on national origins would bring us a splendid counterpart of our present population here in the United States. A comparison of the two bases under consideration, the 1890 basis and the national-origins basis, by one with average intelligence, it seems to me, demonstrates that there is a grave doubt as to whether under national origins we would bring in a serious counterpart of our real selves as we are constituted here in America at this time. Indeed, I look upon national origins, in so far as it may bring us a counterpart of our real selves, as something of a fallacy.

In view of the representation which has been made that under national origins we are going to bring in this element of immigration each year which is going to be so much a picture and so much a counterpart of what we really are—I am driven to ask, if so fine a thing as that is going to be accomplished, what is going to happen if one country falls down and fails to send us its entire quota? Here we are, bringing into the country under national origins this perfect mixture, this fine, perfect mixture of all Europeans. We are bringing them in in just those numbers that are going to represent just what we are to-day. Mr. President, what is going to happen if one country which enters into the making of that perfect mixture falls down and does not send a full quota under national origins? Immediately the whole theory goes to smash, and we will bring in a mixture, instead, that is going directly against the grain, according to the theory advanced by certain proponents of the national-origins basis.

Further, what right have we to assume to-day that because Great Britain sent us, back in the colonial period, a given percentage or a given number of people who have brought and engendered the strain which is ours to-day, that that same country would now send us the same kind of people they sent us back in that period? No one, surely, would be foolish enough to say that the make-up of the populations in the European countries to-day is precisely what it was back in 1776, back in the colonial period, back when the first census was taken in America, in 1790. No one would be foolish enough to insist that that was the case.

Mr. President, the accuracy of the national-origins basis of quotas I think I challenged sufficiently on day before yesterday, and raised serious doubt as to the advisability of resorting to national origins as the basis for immigration quotas.

I would like to point out at this time a thing that was laid before Congress a matter of three years ago, an article written by David Maier, and offered for the RECORD, I understand, but I have not been able to find the place in the RECORD. Here is Mr. Maier's story:

> In the calculations cited from pro-English sources it will be observed that the Swedes, who settled Delaware, are not even referred to.

That is, in the census of 1790, I think.

> Comparatively recent studies of the number of Irish in the Revolution have established the fact that their number has been greatly underestimated, as in the case of the Germans, and similar underestimates have been made with regard to other elements of the population than those hailing from England.
> To these considerations must be added the important circumstance that the large number of Tories were recruited entirely from the English element. Not counting the English loyalists, who remained in the country but did not take up arms against American independence, there were 29 or 30 regiments, composed entirely of Tories, fighting on the side of the enemies of the American Colonies, outdoing the English and Scotch in ferocity and in many instances leading the Indians against their former neighbors. These and their children make up a considerable number of the estimated population of 1790, upon which the present legislation is based.
> It is surely important to take into account this pregnant historical circumstance in a project to determine immigration quotas, having in view the welfare and security of the United States. On this subject John Adams declared:
> "New York and Pennsylvania were so evenly divided, if their propensity was not against us, that if New England on the one side and Virginia on the other had not kept them in awe they would have joined the British. Marshall, in his Life of Washington, tells us that the Southern States were nearly equally divided. Look into the Journals of Congress and you will see how seditious, how near rebellion were several counties of New York and how much trouble we had to compose them. * * * Upon the whole, if we allow two-thirds of the people to have been with us in the Revolution, is not the allowance ample?"
> In 1815 Adams wrote:
> "I should say that fully one-third were averse to the Revolution." Replying to this, Thomas McKean, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, indorsed this estimate. "On mature deliberation," he wrote, "I conclude you are right, and that more than a third of influential characters were against it."
> It follows, then, that if we deduct one-third from the most reliable estimates of the population of the Colonies obtainable for the Revolutionary period, there were but 1,400,000 loyalists, and if from these we deduct the Germans, Irish, Dutch, Swedes, and the Huguenot stock, the imaginary 83 per cent of English who fought for American independence dwindles rapidly and probably did not greatly exceed a million.

If place of birth or "racial origin" alone is to determine who is to be excluded, and under this conception immigrants of English, Scotch, and Welsh stock are to benefit by our hospitality and another pioneer stock is to suffer the pains of discrimination, the stock so favored should be recorded in our history as rendering proportionate service to their adopted country in time of need. If we drop the "racial-origin" theory and apply the yardstick of performance in the emergency arising during the Civil War for soldiers to defend the Union, we find the ratio fixed by the Carnegie Foundation completely reversed—37 per cent of the foreign-born soldiers in the Union Army were of German and only 8 per cent of English birth, according to the officially published Investigation in the Statistics of American Soldiers, by B. A. Gould (1869). Gould's table credits the Germans with 187,858 and the English with only 45,508. We then find that the racial stock to be especially favored was not as important during the Revolutionary War as represented by the biased interests referred to, and was not a material factor in the next ensuing crisis of our national existence.

This refers to the Gould statistics, and I am going to ask that at this point in my remarks the table indicated as Table No. 3, appearing on page 27 of the volume which I hold in my hand, may be incorporated in and made a part of the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have made considerable reference to the make-up of our population back in 1790 and back in the Revolutionary War period. I have also made reference to the part which the population statistics of 1790 are playing in the laying of the basis for immigration purposes under the national-origins clause.

An extensive basis in the building of the national-origins quotas is the 1790 census, that being the first census taken in the history of our country, a census involving only the enumeration of names and numbers. From this census of names and numbers the Census Bureau some years ago compiled a volume known as A Century of Population Growth. This volume also has played a very important part in the considerations of the experts who have estimated the quotas to which each country is entitled under the national-origins clause of the immigration act of 1924. According to this volume, A Century of Population Growth, the total white population of 1790 in the United States is divided as follows:

	Population	Per cent
English	2,345,844	83.5
Scotch	188,589	6.7
German	156,457	5.6
Dutch	56,623	2.0
Irish	44,273	1.6
French	13,384	.5
Hebrew and all others	5,078	.1
Total	2,810,248	100.0

These figures when carried out in division of the German and Irish totals therein shown demonstrate beyond a shadow of doubt the inaccuracy and unfairness of the conclusions reached in this volume, A Century of Population Growth.

Take the case of the Irish. According to these census figures, there are shown to have been in the State of Massachusetts in 1790, 3,732 people of Irish descent. Yet the records in the city of Boston alone disclose nearly 2,000 persons bearing Irish names married there in Boston during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. It is further shown through the published vital records that 53 other Massachusetts towns and cities had 1,700 entries covering marriage and births of people of Irish name prior to the year 1790. Add to these totals of known Irish residents in Massachusetts in 1790 the approximate 10,000 Irish names appearing in the Colonial Records published by the New England Historical Society, in the probate and land records of Massachusetts, and in the town and country history and historical collections like those of the Essex Institute, and the mystery deepens with relation to this thing called national origins, particularly when these figures are compared with the 3,732 lone persons of Irish descent indicated by our census records.

The Century of Population Growth shows there to have been 8,614 people of Irish descent in Pennsylvania in 1790. If this conclusion be true, what in the world became of the descendents of Irish immigrants, numbering, according to authentic historical documents, 12,000 per year, who came to the Province of Pennsylvania between the years 1726 and 1750? More than that, what became of the 18,000 Irish immigrants who came to America during the first half of the year 1773 alone?

The census records upon which the national-origins basis of immigration quotas is builded shows there to have been 5,008 persons of Irish descent in Maryland, and yet the records of the Continental Army show that upward of 4,600 Revolutionary soldiers of Irish names enlisted in Maryland. An exact count of Irish names shown in the land records of Maryland of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries brings a total of 2,100. The descendents of all of these people had entirely disappeared at the time the first census was taken, seemingly.

New York is shown by the Century of Population Growth to have had 2,525 people of Irish descent in 1790. If this be true, what explanation is there to offer when it is pointed out that several thousand Irish names were listed in the marriage, land, military, and court records published by the New York Historical Society.

Let us revert for the moment to the manner in which this Government document which plays so large a part in the building of a basis of quotas under the national-origins plan has to say about the matter of names. It is represented that there were 73 heads of families named O'Brien in the United States in 1790, and that since the average size of the family of O'Briens is given at 5.2 the total number of O'Briens in the entire country, males and females of all ages, is given at 376. Yet, Mr. President, there are found approximately 250 O'Briens on the Revolutionary muster rolls alone. Of the McCartys it is shown there to have been a total of 625 in the United States in 1790, and yet the number of soldiers named McCarty recorded on the muster rolls of the Revolutionary Army is 335.

Mr. President, what a miserable attempt is this which has been made to determine the origin of the population found in the United States in 1790! To arrive at any conclusion at all it has been necessary to resort to a determination of names. This in itself has been an impossible task, as has been so clearly demonstrated. But more than that in importance is the demonstration which has been offered of the failure of the 1790 census to fairly disclose the numbers who were then in America.

It must be clear to anyone that this question of national origins is hazy, that it is not possible to even approach accuracy in determining what was the origin of that part of the population which was found resident in America in 1790.

Mr. President, it is an easy matter to attack the national-origins basis of quotas, but it is quite unfair to attack without having something to resort to to take its place, something as accurate or more accurate, something at least that is acceptable, and so to that extent to-day I want to argue that it is far better to take the present basis of immigration quotas under which we are working, that it is a more accurate basis than would be the national origins.

It has been represented that the 1890 basis under which we are building our quotas now is open to attack and will always be open to attack. I expect that any immigration basis will be open to attack, and always will be open to attack, but I insist that the national-origins basis is open to broader attack, is open to more violent attack than is the 1890 basis under which we are operating at this time. The 1890 basis is not all that it could be, is not as accurate and fair as it might be, but I insist that it is more accurate than the national-origins plan, I insist that it is fairer than the national-origins plan, and I insist above all else that the 1890 basis is more understandable than is the national-origins plan. The 1890 plan may be arbitrary, it may be quite arbitrary, and yet it is not without its good points. Mr. Harry H. Curran, speaking before the Economic Club in New York on March 25, 1924, declared:

If we drop the 1910 measure and take up the 1890 measure, we come, with a few minor differences in the case of individual nations, to a measure that almost exactly gives each part of Europe that to which it is entitled—no more and no less.

That is why I am for the 1890 measure. It helps us to become more homogeneous by sending to us every year a miniature or replica of that which we are already, according to original national stock.

The 1890 measure is the soundest, the healthiest, the fairest, and the best. I hope you will write to your Senators and Congressmen and tell them so.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NYE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Is it not true that Mr. Curran said that before the national-origins plan had been suggested?

Mr. NYE. Oh, I think not.

Mr. REED. That quotation was from something he said in March, 1924.

Mr. NYE. It was March 25, 1924.

Mr. REED. I think that was before the national-origins amendment had been adopted.

Mr. NYE. Yes; that would be quite true.

Mr. REED. I believe Mr. Curran is now one of the strongest advocates of national origins.

Mr. NYE. Yes; and I quoted day before yesterday Mr. Madison Grant as an authority on the nature of the population that came to America from Britain in colonial days and showed it was not an English stock which then came to us from Britain. I want it also to be known that Mr. Madison Grant is also one who now declares himself for the national-origins plan of immigration quotas, a basis which credits that colonial immigration to Britain.

I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD at this point a chart which is like that which hangs upon the wall at the back of the Senate Chamber at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Table showing immigration from certain countries during first 70 years of immigration statistics, 1820–1890, and comparison with existing and national-origins quotas

Mr. REED. Mr. President, would the Senator be willing to carry out the figures to the next three decades?

Mr. NYE. Not for the purposes for which I have prepared the chart.

Mr. President, I am sure that Members of the Senate have given considerable thought and study to the chart which hangs upon the back wall of the Senate Chamber at this time. I want to say before proceeding with any discussion regarding those figures that it ought to be noted that in the case of Ireland, for example, where there is shown a total immigration from Ireland for 70 years and where there is shown the British for 70 years and where there is shown the quotas to which they are entitled under the present basis and where they are shown as to the number who could come from that country under the national-origins plan, that in part those figures belong to England; in other words, that the quota on the 1890 basis instead of being 28,567 ought to be in all probability less than that, because the 1890 basis has not fully succeeded in eliminating the number of Irish who might be included under the English quota.

Mr. President, the 1890 basis is of a rather arbitrary nature. It was determined that for temporary purposes it would be fair to say that in 1890 we had a given percentage of immigration from the various countries of Europe and that in so far as those percentages could be carried out they should prevail in the making of the 1890 basis of quotas. It was felt that, according to the 1890 census of the foreign-born population in America, if Italy was shown to have had a given percentage of the foreign-born population in 1890, then Italy should have that same percentage of the total immigration which would be permitted under the 1890 basis. So while that was rather arbitrary it is, indeed, surprising to find out how very well it has worked out in proportion and in justice to the people who came to us over the period of the 70 years preceding 1890, the first 70 years of immigration statistics.

The first records of immigration were those of 1820. Taking those records through 10-year periods, starting from 1820 leading up to 1890, we find the total 70-year immigration from the leading countries of England, Scotland, Wales, Belgium, Italy, Russia, Greece, Germany, Ireland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. My authority for these figures, Mr. President, is the annual report for 1926 of the Commissioner General of Immigration, and the figures are found at page 168 of that report. Finding the total for that 70-year period, it is not difficult to ascertain what the average immigration from those countries was during that 70-year period.

In the case of England, Scotland, and Wales we find that the average was 39,380, and under the 1890 quota basis, which is now in effect and which rests upon the number of foreign born from a given country who were found in the United States according to the census of 1890, we find that those countries are entitled under the present immigration law to 34,007, or about 5,000 less than their average for the 70-year period.

Then, considering Belgium, we find that her 70-year average was 628, and that she is entitled to a few less than that number under the 1890 basis—she is entitled to 512.

In the case of Italy, we find that Italy sent an average of 5,551 for that 70-year period, and under the basis now in effect that country is entitled to 3,845 immigrants each year.

As to Russia, we find that that country sent an average of 3,663 to us each year, and that under the present basis of quotas, which I declare is fairer than the national-origins basis, she is entitled to 2,248, less by quite a considerable number than that country had sent on the average.

Greece sent us an average during that 70 years of 39, yet under the present basis of immigration quotas we are letting her have 100 in an arbitrary manner.

Germany sent us during that 70-year period an average of 64,359 a year, while on the present basis she is sending us less than that number—only 51,227. If the 1890 basis discriminates against any people, then the discrimination is against Germany rather than England; and yet we do not find any discontent noticeable at this time with the 1890 basis.

Ireland sent us an average for 70 years of 49,781, and we are letting her send us now, under the present basis, 28,567. The Irish are discriminated against in a broader way than is even Germany by comparison with the British quotas.

Denmark sent us an average of 2,036 for the 70-year period, and yet we are permitting her now to send 2,789.

The average sent from Norway during the 70-year period was 5,424, yet under the present basis we are permitting her to send 6,453.

Sweden sent us an average of 7,791 during that 70-year period, and under the basis now in effect she sends us more than that number, namely, 9,561.

In the case of those three Scandinavian countries, Mr. President, the discrimination, according to the 1890 basis, is all in their favor; of that there can be no denial. However, I wish to show now that at any time we can take that 70-year period as a basis and build up immigration quotas upon it, and do it thoroughly, do it in an understandable manner, and do it in a way that will invite far greater confidence than the national-origins plan can possibly bring.

On the bottom line of the table hanging on the wall of the Chamber, which, however, is so low that Senators in their seats can not succeed in seeing it, I have given the figures of quotas which would prevail in the event the national-origins clause should become effective, as it will in the event the Congress does not repeal that clause of the immigration act before July 1 of this year.

In the case of England, Scotland, Wales, again, they each sent us, during that first 70-year period of immigration statistics, 39,380 immigrants annually. They are going to have under the national-origins plan pretty nearly twice that number, namely, 65,721.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. Of course, that quota of 65,721 applies also to North Ireland.

Mr. NYE. That applies also to North Ireland, which I sought to make, but perhaps I did not succeed in making, perfectly clear, some moments ago.

Belgium, which sent us an average of 628 immigrants during that first 70 years of immigration statistics, will be entitled to 1,304 under the national-origins plan.

Italy, which sent us 5,551 on the average for 70 years, will send us 5,802 under the national-origins basis.

Russia, which sent us 3,663 during the 70-year period, will send us, under the national-origins plan, 2,784.

Greece, which sent us 39 on the average for the 70-year period, will be privileged to send us 307, instead of 100 as is now provided on the 1890 basis.

Germany, which sent us 64,359 on the average for 70 years, is going to be unmercifully cut to 29,957 a year, while Great Britain will increase its percentage largely over what she sent in the way of an average during the 70-year period.

The case of Ireland is inviting severe and deep criticism, Mr. President, for it sent us on an average, for the 70 years, 49,781 immigrants, while under the national-origins plan that country will be entitled to but 17,853.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CONNALLY in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator is speaking now of Ireland. A little while ago something was said about the percentage of those who came over from Ireland in colonial days, and some Senator stated that about half of those who served in the Revolutionary Army were Irish. Those troops came from northern Ireland, and no Irishmen of any consequence came here from southern Ireland until about 1850.

Mr. NYE. O Mr. President, I think the Senator is drawing a line that can not be substantiated when he says that none came from southern Ireland until 1850, because the pages of our history disclose that many of them came.

Mr. HEFLIN. Very few came.

Mr. NYE. Many of them came from southern Ireland.

Mr. HEFLIN. But the Senator does not deny that the bulk of those who were here in Revolutionary days came from northern Ireland, does he?

Mr. NYE. I think the division was quite even, Mr. President, or that the greater number came from southern Ireland rather than from northern Ireland.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, no; the Senator is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. NYE. Be that as it may, Mr. President, Denmark, which sent us an average of 2,036 for the 70-year period, is going to be cut under the national-origins basis to 1,181.

Norway, which sent us an average of 5,424 during the 70-year period, will under the national-origins provision be privileged to send only 2,377; and Sweden, which sent us an average of 7,791 during the 70-year period, will be cut more than in two; it will be cut to 3,314.

Mr. President, I do not maintain, as I have said, that the 1890 basis of immigration is as accurate as it might be or as fair as it might be, but I do insist that we can take the 1890 basis and continue it in effect for another year at least and have a far more acceptable plan than would be the national-origins basis. Then when time is more ample let Congress return here and take the recognized figures shown by the 70 years of immigration statistics, starting in 1820 and ending in 1890. Those statistics are not derived from a resort to the tracing of names to ascertain the origin of people, but are obtained through more reliable sources. Let us base immigration quotas upon figures of that kind. It would reduce, to be sure, the number who are now permitted to come from Norway and Sweden and Denmark; but it would not materially reduce that number, and, on the whole, basing immigration quotas upon that 70-year period of immigration to America, would bring us an immigration very similar to that which is coming under the 1890 basis.

Mr. President, there has been grave doubt raised as to the advisability of employing the national-origins basis. The commission composed of Secretaries Hoover, Kellogg, and Davis in one of their reports to Congress, only a matter of two years ago—not more than two years ago at any rate—declared:

> The report of the subcommittee is self-explanatory and is stated to be a preliminary report; yet, in the judgment of that committee, further investigation will not substantially alter the presentation. Although this is the best information we have been able to secure, we wish to call attention to the reservations made by the committee, and to state that, in our opinion, the statistical and historical information available raises grave doubts as to the whole value of these computations as a basis for the purpose intended. We therefore can not assume responsibility for such conclusions under the circumstances.

Mr. President, this commission authorized by Congress——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NYE. The Senator from Massachusetts will wait for just a moment, I am sure. This commission which was authorized by Congress to compute the quotas which would prevail under the national-origins clause has made it very clear that it is unanimously of the opinion that the national-origins basis is not practicable, is not accurate, and is going to work unnecessary hardship. Yet we are receiving information supplied us by the experts named by this very commission, and we accept what they have to say as being the last word in the controversy. I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to inquire of the Senator if President Coolidge did not also entertain those grave doubts, and was not his position in accord with that of President Hoover?

Mr. NYE. I think that is the case, and I hope the Senator has the record as to that fact on his desk.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us what evidence he has that such is the case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will address the Chair when seeking to interrupt the Senator having the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator from Massachusetts tell us what his authority is for the statement he has just made?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The action of President Coolidge in asking Congress to extend the time before the national-origins provision of the immigration law should go into effect.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator know that that was after the quota board had stated that additional time for study would be an assistance to it?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not recall the exact time, but I do know that on one occasion at least, if not on more than one occasion, President Coolidge requested of Congress an extension of time before the national-origins provision should go into effect; and I also know that he took no step to have the national-origins provision become operative during his administration.

Mr. REED. But at no time did he make any effort to secure its repeal.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think that is correct.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have heard Senators wonder why it was that there have not been more protests received by them from their constituents than have been received during this special session of Congress. Many of them say that in the last session of Congress they received many more protests than they are receiving now. It is not difficult to understand why that should be the case, because the people of the United States during the late campaign were prevailed upon to believe, and with good reason, that when the special session of Congress was convened the national-origins feature would be repealed, because both candidates for the Presidency pledged themselves to its repeal, and the successful candidate for the Presidency in his first message to Congress asked for at least a delay in the effectiveness of the national-origins clause. It is not surprising that under those circumstances the people should feel that with the election over the fate of national origins had been sealed; and they have not been concerned about writing to their representatives and letting their wishes be known, because they had already done that a year ago; and yet in spite of that, Mr. President, there have been countless protests filed against national origins even with Members of Congress during this special session.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator states that the successful candidate and also the Democratic candidate pledged themselves to the repeal of the national-origins clause. I do not know that either one of them made himself very plain upon that subject; but the successful candidate, as far as all of his speeches are concerned, certainly did not make it plain that he was in favor of repealing the national-origins plan.

I know he has recommended it; but I think that throughout the country, especially in my part of the country, the Democrats who voted for Mr. Hoover thought that they were supporting a man who was in favor of maintaining the national-origins plan instead of a man who favored repealing it. Has the Senator any statement from him on the subject during the campaign that was plain, that a man could read as he runs, and know how he stood on the question?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, anyone who heard or who read what President Hoover said in his acceptance speech with relation to the national-origins clause and then went off and voted for Mr. Hoover because he did not understand that he was against the national-origins clause—well, I will tell the Senator frankly that such a man ought to be examined, because no man could have made his position upon national origins plainer than President Hoover made his position in his acceptance speech. Let me read it. I have read it before, but it will do no harm to read it again:

> No man will say that any immigration or tariff law is perfect. We welcome our new immigrant citizens and their great contribution to our Nation; we seek only to protect them equally with those already here. We shall amend the immigration laws to relieve unnecessary hardships upon families. As a member of the commission whose duty it is to determine the quota basis under the national-origins law I have found it is impossible to do so accurately and without hardship. The basis now in effect carries out the essential principle of the law and I favor repeal of that part of the act calling for a new basis of quotas.

Can there be any excuse for misunderstanding that kind of language? Hardly, Mr. President.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield further to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Those who were championing the cause of Mr. Hoover during the campaign in my part of the country took the position that Mr. Smith was in favor of the repeal, and that Mr. Hoover, while he had criticized the national-origins plan, had not stated that he favored the repeal of it. A great many of them thought that he was in favor of continuing it.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I know nothing of what representations were made; but in the face of that acceptance speech which preceded the campaign throughout the United States there is little excuse for anyone to have drawn the conclusion that there was any doubt in Mr. Hoover's mind as to what ought to be done about the national-origins clause.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And President Hoover, up to date, has not changed his mind?

Mr. NYE. He has not, Mr. President.

The real strength which comes to the movement in favor of national origins comes because of the representation that has been made, and for which there is some little ground, that the national-origins clause will serve as a further restriction of immigration to the United States annually. In a very, very small way that is true; but, Mr. President, proponents of repeal of national origins have declared here on the floor their intent to move an amendment to the bill to repeal national origins, when it shall come before the Senate—as it will come if we are successful in discharging the committee from the further consideration of that bill—that will bring down the total immigration on the 1890 basis, now effective, to a point that will be no greater and to a point that may be less than that which would be permitted under the national-origins basis of immigration quotas. In all seriousness we shall endeavor to bring about the adoption of such an amendment to that bill calling for repeal of the national-origins clause; and with that done, Mr. President, what becomes of the argument that the national-origins clause is purely and simply a measure of further restriction of immigration into America? It does not exist at all.

Americans as a whole are in favor of restricted immigration, and, as a general thing, would be for a measure, I think, to-day, that perhaps reduced the present total of immigration to this country annually in some small way; but, Mr. President, when they know what this is all about, they can not turn to national origins as a basis and call it a purely restrictive immigration issue, because it is not that at all.

Why do not those who quibble about the further restrictions that national origins bring devote their time, their energy, and their attention to some restriction against the immigration that is coming into the United States annually from Mexico, where an opportunity is afforded to restrict immigration to the extent of fifty or sixty thousand a year—fifty or sixty thousand coming from Mexico every year, without the semblance of restriction against that measure of immigration? If we are going to be sticklers for restricted immigration, there is the place to start in; not upon the people of Sweden and of Norway and of Denmark and of Germany and of Ireland, but upon the people of that country which has contributed so much less to our well being, to our progress, and to the history of our country, than those other people I mention have afforded.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator if the investigations made by the Labor Department do not show that unfortunately the living conditions of the immigrants from Mexico are the poorest of any of the immigrants to this country?

Mr. NYE. I should not venture to answer the Senator's question positively; but, from general information, I should say that that was the case.

Mr. President, in conclusion I think the Senate ought to do its part at this time in bringing about repeal of the national-origins clause. The President has asked for a vote and for a decision upon that matter. I hope it may be accorded.

I think we ought to oppose national origins for the reasons which I have stated at some length:

First. Because the national-origins basis of quotas is inaccurate and unfair.

Second. Because the national-origins basis does not accomplish and does not do what its proponents insist it will do.

Third. We ought to oppose national origins because it penalizes the races which have contributed the finest that is in us here in America to-day.

Fourth. We ought to oppose national origins because it is not an understandable basis, and because it is not an explainable basis.

Fifth. We ought to oppose national origins here as a body because it works unnecessary hardships upon a people, as was declared by President Hoover.

Sixth. We ought to oppose national origins because it does not invite the confidence of people whose confidence is necessary to the success of any immigration measure.

Seventh. We ought to oppose national origins because of the incompleteness of the records upon which immigration quotas are builded under the national-origins plan.

Eighth. We ought to oppose national origins because it attempts to base quotas upon facts and figures which in large part have been destroyed by fires engendered by the British back in 1814.

Ninth. We ought to oppose national origins because it is too largely based upon names; and names have been demonstrated as meaning so little here in America.

Tenth. We ought to oppose national origins because of its complication as well as because of its inaccuracy.

Albert Bushnell Hart, in the June number of Current History, declared this:

> The difficulty of the national-origins plan is that it is necessarily based not on recorded numbers but on calculations.

"Not on recorded numbers but on calculations!" And such is the case as many of us see it, Mr. President.

Eleventh. We ought to oppose national origins because it offers no improvement whatsoever over the basis which is now in effect. I insist that we ought to give very serious thought, and I want to point that out again, to the manner in which these various estimates have been submitted to the Senate by the experts upon whom has devolved the job of ascertaining what the quotas would be under the immigration law. We ought to look to the five estimates that have been made, three of them by this board of experts, and see how they have wabbled, how they have varied from one estimate to another.

I discussed this matter at some length on Monday; and I now ask permission to have incorporated in the RECORD at this point a table of immigration quotas printed for the use of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization of the House of Representatives on February 28 of this year, showing the various estimates which have been submitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the facts being what they are—and I hope they are facts as I have presented them; I have tried to confine myself to truths and to facts—let us let well enough alone, at least until we have something to adopt in which there can be more confidence than in that which we already have and use, and which has been quite generally accepted and quite generally approved. The present basis may not be altogether fair; but it at least affords a fair and understandable basis, and one which affords an insight into a truly fair basis, and one that is bringing us now a splendid balance of the kind of people who have contributed much worth while in virtually every step of pioneering and every step of progress of which this Nation has enjoyed the benefits in other days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE].

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in order that I may make the point of no quorum?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire first to make a statement. I am not fully prepared to go ahead to-day. I should prefer to speak in reply to the Senator from North Dakota to-morrow. So I should like to give notice that as soon as I can obtain recognition after the convening of the Senate to-morrow I shall speak in reply to the Senator from North Dakota on this subject.

I understand that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has a request in mind.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not, of course, want to interfere with the measure that is pending. If, however, it is agreeable to the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Pennsylvania, I should like to call up Order of Business No. 1, the proposed amendment to the Constitution similar to one which has passed the Senate two or three times and went over yesterday when reached on the calendar because of the absence of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NYE rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to consult the wishes of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. Unless some one wishes to speak upon the immigration question, I certainly would have no objection to the Senate taking up the joint resolution providing for a constitutional amendment. As far as I know, it is not the desire of anyone to speak at this particular time on the immigration question.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 3, introduced by me, providing for an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, before that request is submitted, I desire to lay before the Senate a matter which I had overlooked.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well, Mr. President; I yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have a letter written by Charles Nagel, of St. Louis, a member of the immigration committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, to Senator ROSCOE C. PATTERSON, of Missouri. The Senator from Missouri offered it yesterday for the RECORD, but I desire that the letter may be read to the Senate. I ask now that when the matter to which the Senator from Nebraska has referred, the joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment, shall have been disposed of, the clerk may read this letter to the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is the Senator offering the report of the committee on immigration of the United States Chamber of Commerce?

Mr. NYE. No; this is not the report of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I realize that little remains to be said, in view of the admirable presentation against the adoption of the national-origins provision of the immigration law as a national policy, embraced in the informative and able address of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE]. He has covered every aspect of the question so fully that, of necessity, whatever may be said by those who follow him in debate advocating the repeal of the national-origins provision, will be largely repetition.

It seems to me, however, the Senate and the country will be interested in having the opinion of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States on this question. A very exhaustive report of the immigration committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which committee was composed of 13 of the best-known and ablest business and industrial leaders of the country, representative of every section of the country, was made public at the annual meeting of this organization, held in Washington, D. C., April 29–May 3. This report surely represents the opinion of a group whose patriotism and impartiality can not be questioned.

It was the judgment of this committee that the quota-limit system now in operation, based upon 2 per cent of the foreign-born living here in 1890, be made a permanent national policy. This conclusion was reached after a study of—

First. What the national-origins provision is;

Second. What the 1890 census quota-limit system is;

Third. The relation of the national origins and 1890 census quota-limit system to a national policy of restricted immigration; and Fourth. Reasons for the Immigration Committee's recommendation.

Speaking of the national-origins quota basis the report states:

The technical methods employed to accomplish this [quota allotment based on national origins] are from the layman's viewpoint complicated and involve difficulties, which in the judgment of the immigration committee [of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States] have not yet been solved.

The committee further says:

The difficulty is that the national-origins plan requires apparently the use of a very fine tool to try to accomplish what can only at best be a very rough judgment of the relative importance of European seed stocks in our present white population.

In view also of the presentation for the RECORD of various petitions and memorials from patriotic societies favoring the maintenance of the national-origins provision of the immigration law, I present a communication, similar to others received, from the Tenth District Council of the American Legion, district of Massachusetts, representing 32 posts, located in southeastern Massachusetts.

Mr. President, I ask that the letter of the president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, the report of the immigration committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, and the communication from representatives of the American Legion of southeastern Massachusetts be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, May 8, 1929.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: In order that you may be more fully informed with reference to the position taken on the national-origins plan by the delegates in session at the national chamber's recent seventeenth annual meeting, I am inclosing a copy of the report of the chamber's immigration committee.

This report contains the resolution proposed by the immigration committee, which in substance was approved by the delegates, recommending the repeal of the national-origins provision of the 1924 immigration act and the continuance of the quota-limit system at present in operation. The exact text of the resolution as adopted by our seventeenth annual meeting is likewise inclosed.

I might add that this report was in the hands of the chamber's member organizations in ample time (40 days) prior to the annual meeting, to insure a considered action. You will find of interest, I am sure, the committee's statement explaining and supporting the resolution.

A sound and practical basis of immigration restriction is a matter of great importance to the entire country. I very much hope that the judgment of American business on this question, as expressed through the national chamber, may have your careful thought.

Yours very truly,

WM. BUTTERWORTH, President.

NATIONAL IMMIGRATION POLICY—A RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE IMMIGRATION COMMITTEE RECOMMENDING THE REPEAL OF THE NATIONAL-ORIGINS PROVISION OF THE 1924 IMMIGRATION LAW AND THE CONTINUANCE OF THE QUOTA LIMIT SYSTEM NOW IN OPERATION

REPORT OF IMMIGRATION COMMITTEE, CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES

The committee on immigration of the national chamber, in accordance with authority granted by the board of directors, presents to the chamber's constituent membership for their consideration at the seventeenth annual meeting, April 29 to May 3, 1929, the following resolution dealing with the country's immigration policy, which the committee recommends should be adopted:

"The provisions of the immigration law of 1924 which apply the quota-limit system to the countries of Europe, Asia, Africa, and Australasia, on the 1890 census basis of foreign born, have been in operation now for nearly five years. These provisions have become an accepted part of our national policy. Our industrial and social life, our citizens, and our foreign-born residents, as well as foreigners abroad who are contemplating coming to this country for permanent residence, have largely adjusted themselves to this policy. During this period the so-called national-origins provision of the 1924 immigration law, which originally was intended to replace on July 1, 1927, the quota-limit system based on the 1890 census, referred to above, has not been in operation.

"This provision proposes to limit immigration from Old World countries to about 150,000 (this number is raised to 153,714 (last report) by admitting 100 immigrants each from several small countries), as compared with the 164,667 at present admissible, and to allow an annual quota to any nationality equal to a number which bears the same ratio to 150,000 as the number of people living here in 1920 deriving from that nationality bears to the total number of our inhabitants. The operation of this provision has been twice postponed by Congress in the face of problems, as yet unsolved, connected with the development of a satisfactory plan for the accurate determination of the racial content of the country.

"It would be a mistake, in our opinion, to disrupt the adjustments which have been made under the actual operation of the law to date, and by changing the basis of present quotas unnecessarily to stir up racial antagonisms. We, therefore, recommend the repeal of the national-origins provision of the immigration law of 1924 and urge the continuance of the quota-limit system now in operation based upon 2 per cent of foreign born living here in 1890."

While there is a general familiarity with the subject matter of this proposed resolution, it seems desirable to the immigration committee, in order that the action on this important matter at the annual meeting may be well considered, to explain:

1. What the national-origins provision of the 1924 immigration law is.

2. What the quota-limit system, now in operation, based on 2 per cent of the foreign born living here in 1890 is.

3. The relation of the national origins and the 1890 census quota-limit systems to a national policy of restrictive immigration.

4. Reasons for the immigration committee's recommendation that the national-origins provision be repealed and the 1890 census quota-limit system be continued."

(1) WHAT THE NATIONAL-ORIGINS PROVISION IS

When our present immigration law was passed in 1924 it contained a provision that by July 1, 1927, the immigration quotas from Old World countries should be determined on the basis of the contribution which each of these countries has made to our total white population from these quota countries as shown by the census of 1920.

The Old World or quota countries are the countries of Europe, Asia, Africa, and Australasia. According to the 1920 census, 89,332,158 of our total white population originated in these countries.

The national-origins provision sets the total number of quota immigrants we would admit from Old World countries at 150,000. Each Old World country then is to have a proportion of that 150,000 equal to the proportion of its contribution to our total white population (excluding that originating in North and South America, which was left unlimited by the quota legislation). In other words, if a country has contributed one-fourth of the 89,332,158 white people living here in 1920, then it can send one-fourth of 150,000 immigrants each year.

While the 1924 immigration law contemplated that this national-origins plan should go into operation by July 1, 1927, the effective date of this provision of the law has been twice postponed by Congress—first, until July 1, 1928, and then until July 1, 1929, which is now the effective date. That means that unless Congress either again postpones the effective date until July 1, 1930, or repeals the national-origins provision of the law, we will change over on July 1, 1929, from the quota-limit system now in operation to the quota-limit system which has just been described.

The following is the exact statement, taken from section 11 of the immigration law of 1924, which provides for this national-origins quota-limit system:

"(b) The annual quota of any nationality for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1927, and for each fiscal year thereafter, shall be a number which bears the same ratio to 150,000 as the number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920 having that national origin (ascertained as hereinafter provided in this section) bears to the number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920, but the minimum quota of any nationality shall be 100.

"(c) For the purpose of subdivision (b) national origin shall be ascertained by determining as nearly as may be, in respect of each geographical area which under section 12 is to be treated as a separate country (except the geographical areas specified in subdivision (c) of section 4) the number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920 whose origin by birth or ancestry is attributable to such geographical area. Such determination shall not be made by tracing the ancestors or descendants of particular individuals but shall be based upon statistics of immigration and emigration, together with rates of increase of population as shown by successive decennial United States censuses and such other data as may be found to be reliable.

"(d) For the purpose of subdivisions (b) and (c) the term 'inhabitants in continental United States in 1920' does not include (1) immigrants from the geographical areas specified in subdivision (c) of section 4 or their descendants, (2) aliens ineligible to citizenship or their descendants, (3) the descendants of slave immigrants, or (4) the descendants of American aborigines.

"(e) The determination provided for in subdivision (c) of this section shall be made by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor jointly. In making such determination such officials may call for information and expert assistance from the Bureau of the Census. Such officials shall, jointly, report to the President the quota of each nationality, determined as provided in subdivision (b), and the President shall proclaim and make known the quotas so reported. Such proclamation shall be made on or before April 1, 1927. If the proclamation is not made on or before such date, quotas proclaimed therein shall not be in effect for any fiscal year beginning before the expiration of 90 days after the date of the proclamation. After the making of a proclamation under this subdivision, the quotas proclaimed therein shall continue with the same effect as if specifically stated herein and shall be final and conclusive for every purpose except (1) in so far as it is made to appear to the satisfaction of such officials and proclaimed by the President that an error of fact has occurred in such determination or in such proclamation, or (2) in the case provided for in subdivision (c) of section 12. If for any reason quotas proclaimed under this subdivision are not in effect for any fiscal year, quotas for such year shall be determined under subdivision (a) of this section."

(2) WHAT THE 1890 CENSUS QUOTA-LIMIT SYSTEM IS

The provision of the 1924 immigration law which went into effect July 1, 1924, and has since been in effect, determines the immigration quotas of Old World countries on the basis of the foreign-born people from these countries who were living here in 1890. Each such country is allowed 2 per cent of those born in that country, counted in our 1890 census. For example, if there were 1,000,000 born in a particular Old World country counted in our 1890 census, then that country can send 2 per cent of 1,000,000 immigrants each year, or 20,000.

Section 11 of the 1924 immigration law provides for this 1890 census quota-limit system in the following subdivision:

"(a) The annual quota of any nationality shall be 2 per cent of the number of foreign-born individuals of such nationality resident in continental United States as determined by the United States census of 1890, but the minimum quota of any nationality shall be 100."

(3) RELATION OF NATIONAL ORIGINS AND 1890 CENSUS QUOTA-LIMIT SYSTEMS TO A NATIONAL POLICY OF RESTRICTIVE IMMIGRATION

Following the war there developed a strong public sentiment that America could not go on indefinitely accepting an unlimited number of aliens each year without suffering economic, social, and political injury. An emergency restrictive immigration law was passed by Congress in 1921. This law limited yearly immigration from Old World countries to 3 per cent of the foreign born from each living here in 1910.

There also developed a feeling that in addition to restricting the yearly number of immigrants we should also devise some practical plan whereby those entering would come from countries akin in race and tradition to those from which the earlier settlers had come. For example, in 1923 the national chamber, through resolution adopted in annual meeting by its constituent members, stated that in its opinion it is in the national interest that the principle of selection should be a controlling factor in any immigration legislation that may be passed by Congress. The chamber was interested in this principle of selection from the viewpoint of insuring "the maintenance of a strong, virile, and essentially homogeneous people that will permit the United States to measure up to its economic, political, and social possibilities."

In 1924 Congress enacted the present immigration law, which embodies a policy of restrictive immigration which not only limits the number admitted each year but allocates that number among Old World countries in a way which tends to favor the immigrants from northern Europe as distinct from southern Europe.

The proposal of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization to accomplish this was through the use of the 1890 census, at which time the proportion of foreign-born residents coming from northwest Europe was much larger than in later censuses.

The proposal of the Senate Committee on Immigration to accomplish this was the national-origins plan. It was felt that use of the 1890 census of foreign born was arbitrary and deficient, in that it failed to take into account the native born in addition to the foreign born in determining quotas. Out of this feeling developed an alternative plan for basing quotas on a racial analysis of the entire population.

Both proposals were written into the immigration law of 1924. It was possible to put the 1890 census method into effect at once, and hence it was made the immediate operating method for effecting the policy of restrictive immigration. Time was required, however, to discover whether it was possible to make a satisfactory analysis of the national origins of the white population, and hence this alternative plan was delayed from going into operation until July 1, 1927, and later, by supplemental acts, until July 1, 1929.

In the meantime an opportunity has been afforded to see what could be done in determining the country's racial content. The Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor set up a board of Government experts, which has gone into the matter in a thoroughgoing way and submitted three analyses, one on January 7, 1927, one on February 27, 1928, and the third, and final one to date, on February 27, 1929. The chamber's immigration committee understands that this last analysis and the quotas based on it represent a completed work; that any additional revisions as the result of subsequent research would be of a very minor character. In other words, we now have, as we did not have in 1924, when the immigration law was passed, a knowledge of the practical difficulties involved in making a racial analysis, the methods which have been employed in an attempt to overcome these difficulties, and what the quotas of various countries will be if the national-origins plan goes into operation. We are thus in a position to decide whether this alternative plan does in fact remove the objections which were raised against the use of the 1890 census of foreign born.

It might be added that this 1924 law divides the world into three parts:

First. The Asiatic barred zone, which contains many peoples, chief among them the Chinese, Japanese, and Hindus.

Second. The Western Hemisphere, immigration from which is controlled by the prequota law of 1917.

Third. The quota countries of Europe, the Near East, Africa, and Australasia.

The allocations of quotas under the 1890 census plan and under the national-origins plan, as set forth in the following tabulation, will show the relation of these two plans to our restrictive immigration policy from the viewpoint of the limitation of the number admissible and the distribution of this number admissible among the several countries:

(4) REASONS FOR THE IMMIGRATION COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATIONS

A policy must be judged by its results. Does our present restrictive immigration policy, as based on the 1890 census, give us the results we want? In the judgment of the chamber's immigration committee it does. It gives us a limited number of immigrants, 164,667, and the bulk of this number, 140,999, from countries which are racially closely akin to the older social interests in the United States.

For that reason the committee recommends the continuance of the quota limit system now in operation based on 2 per cent of the foreign born living here in 1890.

The national-origins provision, if put into operation, would likewise give us a limited number of immigrants, 153,714, a large majority of whom, 125,853, would come from countries similarly akin to ours.

The difference in the total number admitted under the two plans is of comparatively little consequence. The major difference between the two plans is a change in the quota allotments as between northwest European countries. The quotas of the Irish Free State, Germany, Norway, and Sweden would be materially reduced and the quotas of Great Britain and North Ireland and the Netherlands would be materially increased under the national-origins plan.

The advantage, if any, in this change is greatly outweighed, in the judgment of the immigration committee, by the following considerations:

First, our industrial and social life, our citizens and our foreign-born residents, as well as foreigners abroad who are contemplating coming to this country for permanent residence, have largely adjusted themselves to the present 1890 census quota-limit system.

Second, the putting into effect of any restrictive immigration policy is bound to stir up racial antagonisms and misunderstandings. There is plenty of evidence that changing over to the national-origins plan would revivify these antagonisms without any large commensurate gain to our final purpose, which is the building of a homogeneous and united nation.

There has been considerable controversy over the possibility of arriving at a reasonably accurate analysis of the racial content of the country. Such a determination must, of course, be made before quota allotments can be based on national origins. The technical methods employed to accomplish this are, from the layman's viewpoint, complicated and involve difficulties which, in the judgment of the Immigration Committee, have not yet been solved.

For example, the question which the average man of mixed ancestry asks is: How am I going to be counted as of English origin, Irish origin, or German origin if my ancestors, for illustration, came from all three countries?

The answer is that the national-origins plan does not contemplate segregating individuals into those of English origin, of Irish origin, of German origin, etc., but, through a study of the "statistics of immigration and emigration, together with rates of increase of population as shown by the successive decennial United States censuses and such other data as may be found reliable," determining the relative contribution which the immigrants from Old World countries, beginning with the colonial settlements, have made to the creation of the white population living here in 1920. Having made this statistical analysis, the proportionate contribution of the several countries are translated into the abstraction of so many living here of English origin, so many of Irish origin, so many of German origin, etc., which is simply a statistical device necessary to determine the quotas.

While that is the answer to the average man's question, it is obvious that it is hard for him to understand a method which involves such statistical and philosophical abstractions. The difficulty is that the national-origins plan requires apparently the use of a very fine tool to try to accomplish what can only at best be a very rough judgment of the relative importance of European seed stocks in our present white population.

It is only fair to say that the Government experts who made the analysis are satisfied that the statistical and historical research methods employed have given reasonably accurate results. On the other hand, the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor, charged by the law with the responsibility for determining national origins, have refused either individually or collectively to express any opinion on the merits or demerits of the methods employed for arriving at national-origins quotas.

The Immigration Committee gave some weight to these difficulties in arriving at its decision to recommend the repeal of the national-origins provision. They were by no means, however, the deciding factor in its decision. The committee feels that the essential point is to get the kind of immigration restriction which will further the best interests of the United States, and that the technical method of executing this policy is of secondary importance.

Thus it seems relatively unimportant to the committee whether the desired result is arrived at by the 1890 census plan, basing quotas on foreign born residing here or by the national-origins plan, counting not only the foreign born but the native whites living here in 1920. The committee can not help but feel that these plans have no merit other than as they may prove to be practical methods for carrying out a policy of restrictive immigration, and that it is the policy and not the method which is of major importance.

The committee did recognize the fact that the national-origins provision, based on the 1920 census, could be revised each 10 years and be based on the latest census, without changing materially either the number of quota immigrants who would be allowed to enter and without changing the relative proportion who would come from northwest and southeast Europe.

In order to maintain the same kind of immigration policy, based on 2 per cent of the foreign born living here, it is necessary to retain the 1890 census as the basis for allocation of quotas. If later censuses are used, such as 1910 and 1920, or 1930 when it is available, the number of quota immigrants would be greatly increased (unless the 2 per cent is lowered) and in any case the proportions who would come from northwest Europe and southeast Europe would be changed.

It was the judgment of the committee, however, that it is entirely practical to retain the 1890 census and make the quota-limit system which is now in operation a permanent national policy. It has five years of operation behind it, and with the support of an informed and sympathetic public opinion, each year will make it more secure. The committee, therefore, recommends the repeal of the national-origins provision of the immigration law of 1924 and the continuance of the quota-limit system now in operation.

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Rockland, Mass., May 19, 1929.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
House of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting held in Brockton, Sunday, May 12, 1929, of the Tenth District Council, the American Legion, 32 posts, representing Plymouth, Barnstable, Dukes, and Nantucket Counties, unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas it has been brought to our attention the many injustices contained in the so-called national origins bill clause of the immigration law: Be it

"Resolved, That we petition our Senators and Representatives in Congress that they use their influence to have this clause repealed."

We ask your consideration of the sentiment contained within our resolution.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN R. PARKER,
Secretary Tenth District Council, the American Legion.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, does the Senator from North Dakota prefer to have the letter which he has sent to the desk read before I make the point of no quorum?

Mr. NYE. No; I prefer to have it read when next the immigration matter is taken up for consideration.

CHANGE IN DATE OF INAUGURATION

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I renew my request that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 3) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, on page 2, line 3, to strike out "2d" and insert in lieu thereof "15th"; on line 5, to strike out "15th" and insert in lieu thereof "2d";

on line 18, to strike out the words "where the Vice President has not been chosen," and insert in lieu thereof the words "of the failure to choose the Vice President"; and on line 20, after the word "shall," to insert the word "then," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment of the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 15th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 2d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 2d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

"SEC. 3. If the House of Representatives has not chosen a President, whenever the right of choice devolves upon them, before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The Congress shall by law provide for the case of the failure to choose the Vice President before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly until the House of Representatives chooses a President or until the Senate chooses a Vice President.

"SEC. 4. This amendment shall take effect on the 15th day of October after its ratification."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen	Glenn	Metcalf	Steck
Ashurst	Goff	Moses	Steiwer
Barkley	Greene	Norbeck	Swanson
Blease	Harris	Norris	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Harrison	Nye	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Hastings	Oddie	Townsend
Broussard	Hatfield	Overman	Trammell
Burton	Hawes	Patterson	Tydings
Capper	Hayden	Phipps	Tyson
Connally	Heflin	Pine	Vandenberg
Couzens	Howell	Pittman	Wagner
Cutting	Johnson	Ransdell	Walcott
Dale	Kean	Reed	Walsh, Mass.
Deneen	Keyes	Sackett	Walsh, Mont.
Dill	King	Sheppard	Warren
Edge	La Follette	Shortridge	Waterman
Fletcher	McKellar	Simmons	Watson
Frazier	McMaster	Smith	Wheeler
Gillett	McNary	Smoot

Mr. HEFLIN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BLACK] is necessarily detained by illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the author of the joint resolution [Mr. NORRIS] a question, but I do not see him in the Chamber just at this moment. I intend to vote for the joint resolution, but I would like to point out that it would be possible to secure the same result without amending the Constitution. The apparent object of the measure is to eliminate the lame-duck session of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS entered the Chamber.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am glad the Senator from Nebraska has come into the Chamber. I had just said, may I say for his benefit, that I intend to vote for the joint resolution, but I want to ask the Senator if he does not think that much of what is sought to be obtained in the form of a constitutional amendment could be obtained by a mere change of the statute?

I would like to cite this possible set-up: Suppose that Congress would come into session on the 4th of March following a presidential election and would stay in session until the 4th of June, three months, whereas now it comes into session on the first Monday of December and adjourns on the 4th of March, so that the 3-month session would still be had, as is now the case, except that it would be had with the new Congress instead of the old one; that the limitation for its meeting at the first session, if the Congress desires, could be fixed for three months for Members of either House if a long and unlimited session for any reason was undesirable; and that following that session the next Congress would meet in December and would remain in session as long as it desired to do so, just as it now does through a long session of Congress.

It has seemed to me that a change in the statute would secure what the Senator seeks to secure in his amendment, and I wondered whether or not he had considered the possibility of amending the present law fixing the time for the convening of Congress so that a constitutional amendment would not be necessary.

I know the Senator will answer that question in a moment, and before he does I would like to point out the fact that it may be that in the next 50 or 75 years the time fixed in the Senator's amendment would not be as desirable as it is to-day, just like the old construction placed on the Constitution as to the time fixed in it has been outgrown for present-day conditions, and that by putting those dates in the Constitution it would be necessary to amend it again in the event in the future the set-up contained in the joint resolution now pending was not desirable or best for the conditions then unfolding. I thought if we could obtain the same end, and it does seem to me to be possible to obtain it—perhaps not in so nice or as complete a way as the amendment would make it—we would have the language in an elastic shape, so that in the future if the dates set out in the pending amendment were for any reason deemed to be inadvisable or ill fitted we could again merely amend the statute instead of having to amend the Constitution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me say before I answer the Senator's question that I was called to the telephone by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], who is opposed to the joint resolution and wants to have an opportunity to be heard on it. That accounts for my momentary absence from the Chamber. Senators will remember that on yesterday I was about to get the joint resolution before the Senate when I discovered that the Senator from Connecticut was not here, and so I ceased from my attempt. I saw the Senator from Connecticut in the Chamber this morning and when I asked that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of my joint resolution I was under the impression that he was still here, and after the absence of a quorum was suggested I supposed, of course, in response to the call he would come into the Chamber. But I discovered that he was down in the city on semiofficial business attending a luncheon having to do with the Philippine question. He called me on the telephone. I told one of the clerks to call him when I found out where he was and then went to the telephone myself. He can not be here for an hour or so. I dislike very much to take up the resolution in his absence unless some one else wants to occupy the intervening time. I wanted to explain to the Senate the present parliamentary situation.

Now, I want to answer the question of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and it is a very proper question, too. In answer to the Senator I will say that if under the Constitution as it now exists we change the date of meeting, which we could do, and had Congress convene on the 4th day of March instead of the first Monday in December, it would put Congress to work in March after its election and it would be the new Congress; that is true. There are two or three objections to that course, however.

First—and in this I think I will be borne out by every Senator who has been compelled to work in the atmosphere of Washington during the summer time—we would always run into the hot summer months of the Washington climate. We would not be in session from January until the 4th of March, the best time of the year for Congress to operate, the best time in the year to do good work, so we would really be confronted with a short session during the heated term, and when the hot weather came it would be almost impossible to keep Congress here. It would be impossible to do really good legislative work during the hot part of the year here in Washington.

The time between the election and the time when Congress would go into active work would be from November until March, more time, in my judgment, than ought to exist; the best time in the year when legislators ought to be working and operating. It would be impossible for a new Congress under the present Constitution ever to assemble until the 4th of March, because the newly elected Members do not come into office until that time.

I note what the Senator said about putting the dates of meeting in the Constitution and that in 50 or 75 years from now conditions which we can not now foresee may exist which would make that undesirable. If the Senator will look at the amendment and compare it with the present provision of the Constitution, he will find that the amendment itself provides, as does the Constitution now provide, that Congress can fix any other date of meeting. If the time of election were changed, then a condition might arise in which it would be desirable to change the time of meeting. If we could conceive of the time when we would not hold the election in the fall, that suggestion would be worthy of consideration.

All the amendment does is to change the date of the beginning of the term of the President and Members of Congress.

Some lawyers of great ability have argued in times past that we could make that change without an amendment to the Constitution, because the term of office is not fixed in the Constitution; but we are confronted with the dilemma that the Constitution does fix a definite term for Members of the House and of the Senate and of the President. The beginning of that term is not fixed in the Constitution, and neither is the end. The beginning of Congress, as I remember the history of it, was fixed by a statute. In other words, after the Constitution had been adopted fixing a definite term, the beginning of the term was fixed by statute. That being true, a man now in office in the House or a President in office having the beginning of his term fixed and a constitutional limitation as to the length of his term, necessarily under the Constitution his term expires at a certain fixed date. I think it must be conceded by constitutional lawyers that we can not by legislative act shorten the term of the President of the United States nor of Members of the Senate nor of Members of the House of Representatives. My amendment does all three of those things—very slight, it is true, but necessary in order to get the Congress to convene soon after the election and in order to put the new Congress instead of the old Congress to work.

I would like to ask the Senator from Maryland if I have answered his question?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator not only has answered it completely but so logically that I am inclined to agree that his amendment rather than that a change by statute should be had.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I should like to say further in answer to the question of the Senator from Maryland that there would be no Congress in session to receive the election returns and to elect a President in case the Electoral College failed to make a choice.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true; and I thank the Senator for the suggestion.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, the Senator will realize that Congress could meet for just one day and we could amend the Constitution in that respect without changing the whole machinery of government, which would be a much simpler amendment than the one the Senator from Nebraska sponsors. I had not lost sight of that, but I was dealing with the Congress itself.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, I think, misspoke himself. We could arrange for a session of Congress without an amendment to the Constitution so as to take care of that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. But, in the first place, that would necessarily have to be the old Congress.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. And unless——

Mr. TYDINGS. Unless some candidate had received a majority vote the old Congress might pick out a new President.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. DILL. When this measure was before the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress I recall it was defeated largely because of the argument that there was not sufficient time afforded within which to organize the House and elect a President in case the Electoral College should fail to elect. Is there anything in the proposed amendment now that changes the situation in that respect?

Mr. NORRIS. No; the amendment as amended by the committee—and the committee amendments have already been agreed to by the Senate—is in the exact form in which the joint resolution passed the Senate the last time, and in practically the same form in which it has passed the Senate on four different occasions.

I realize, Mr. President, that that argument has been made; but, under the proposed amendment, Congress would have two weeks' time before the beginning of the term of the President in which to count the votes. I presume that in most States, as is the case in mine, no such time as that is allowed to canvass the votes for governor. The terms of the governor and members of the legislature begin at the same time in most of the States—on the same day and at the same hour. The legislature canvasses the votes.

No matter what we might do, we can imagine a case where the best government might fail; we can imagine that all kinds of things might happen; but I can not conceive, Mr. President, of Congress not being able to canvass the votes in two weeks' time. If I were to follow my own inclination I myself would shorten that time to one week instead of two weeks. The subject was debated very seriously several years ago, when the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee had the matter in hand, and we fixed two weeks' time, on the theory that we could not conceive of more time than that being necessary. So I am not anticipating any difficulty as to that.

All the arguments, Mr. President, which are made against the proposed amendment are not, in my judgment, always made in good faith. To begin with, I want it understood that I am not criticizing any man for opposing the amendment, and I am conceding that those who oppose it do so conscientiously; but I have very often come in contact during the last six years in the consideration of this measure with Members of Congress who have urged objections to it which to my mind were only excuses on which to base opposition, and they were really opposed to the amendment for other reasons which to my mind were clear but which no one would probably give as reasons for opposition to the amendment.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Regarding the matter which I mentioned a moment ago as to the inability of the House to act, the one argument which seemed to me to have considerable basis was that there might be a failure to organize the House—it has happened in the past that the House was unable to organize for some time—and therefore it would not be in a position to do business because it had not been organized, and consequently would not be able to elect a President. I myself do not think that is a very serious danger, but it seemed to be the argument that had the deciding weight in the fight that was made in the last session of Congress when the proposed amendment was defeated in the other House.

Mr. NORRIS. My judgment is that argument did not have the deciding weight. I do not know of any argument that did have the deciding weight. I will state what I think the real reason for opposition was.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment.

There are a good many people, and very fine people, too, in this country—some of them are Members of Congress—who are constitutionally opposed to amending the Constitution. They will say so frankly. I know on one occasion when we voted on this very amendment after a roll call a Member who had voted against it told me that he could not see any objection to the amendment; that he thought it would bring about a very necessary reform, and he was sorry it was not in the Constitution. "But," he said, "I would not vote for any amendment to the Constitution, and that is the reason why I voted against the joint resolution."

Mr. DILL. I wish to say to the Senator that I am not advancing this argument as my own.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. DILL. I am extremely anxious to see the joint resolution proposing the amendment passed, not only by the Senate but by the House of Representatives, but I wanted to get any suggestions the Senator from Nebraska might have to make in answer to that argument, in the hope that they might be persuasive on the minds of those who have attached weight to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in the first place, the time might come when the House of Representatives could not organize; the time might come when the Senate could not organize. I can imagine a good many things that might happen over a term of years. We might have such a condition right now. If the President and the Vice President of the United States should both die or should both be killed, for instance, in an automobile accident, we might have a great deal of difficulty in knowing just what to do about the selection of their successors, although we have provided for a succession in office by law. I do not believe a constitution can be adopted that will provide for every possible contingency that may arise. Besides, all such contingencies exist now and always have existed. I do not know of any way to escape them. Now I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I regard this amendment, if it should be adopted, as providing a tremendous improvement on the present system, and it is really difficult to understand what reason can be advanced against such a very necessary amendment to the Constitution. Certainly the present condition is one that ought to be remedied, and I imagine that every person who has ever thought about the situation must realize that it is necessary that some other plan should be adopted. It is so obvious that I can not understand why the House of Representatives has never voted on the proposed constitutional amendment. I do not believe it has ever voted on it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it has voted on it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It did vote on it at one time?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; in the last Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. And voted it down?

Mr. NORRIS. It carried by a large majority, but it did not have the necessary two-thirds majority.

Mr. McKELLAR. So the Senator's purpose now is to have the proposed amendment to the Constitution adopted by the Senate as soon as possible, so that the House may have ample time in which to give it consideration with a view to its final submission to the States at the present session. I certainly hope the amendment to the Constitution proposed by the Senator will be adopted by the Senate; that it will be sent over to the House, and that, upon reconsideration and reflection, that body will also adopt the amendment.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BRATTON. I want to join with the Senator from Tennessee in his expression of commendation of the proposed amendment to the Constitution and in urging that its adoption by Congress be hastened. In my opinion, should the proposed amendment finally become a part of the Constitution, it will improve the present situation and lessen the hazard of difficulties which might easily be conceived under the present legal status. Although the pending proposal may not be perfect, it will make a substantial improvement over the present arrangement. I hope the joint resolution will be passed by the Senate forthwith, and that it will receive the approval of the body at the other end of the Capitol during the present session of Congress, in order that it may be submitted to the several States for their approval.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt that if it were submitted to the States there would not be a State which would reject it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will give me a few minutes to express my commendation of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. I shall be glad to yield the floor and let the Senator speak in his own time.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I think the reform embodied in the joint resolution now pending proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States is one of the most valuable that has been presented for the consideration of Congress in a long time. I believe such an amendment to the Constitution is needed and that it will correct some of the worst abuses from which we suffer in connection with legislative procedure.

First. It will prevent a man being potential in speaking for the country when his constituency shall have repudiated him. It will let the living legislator and not the dead pass on the legislation of Congress, which is a fundamental principle which should be adhered to by a progressive and up-to-date government.

Second. The constitutional amendment, if finally adopted, will prevent filibusters and legislation by blackmail. It will put an end to that condition under which in a short session an individual Senator may prevent the enactment of desirable legislation unless some measure in which he is interested is also allowed to pass.

I have been here for a great many years, and I know that at short sessions of Congress the judgment of the Senate and the judgment of the House have frequently been coerced and both bodies have been made to record themselves in a manner contrary to the wishes of the majority.

Under present conditions a Senator may come upon the floor of the Senate and say, "If you do not consent to a certain amendment in which I am interested, I will filibuster against the pending bill." All the filibustering which we have occurs in short sessions; and it frequently happens that rather than let a measure fail, necessitating a call for an extra session of Congress, legislation that ought not to be enacted is accepted by the Senate and by the House on account of the coercion which may be employed during a short session. Filibusters do not occur at long sessions of Congress, because the filibusterers wear themselves out. During a long session all that is necessary is to continue in session for a sufficient length of time, and thus let a filibuster exhaust itself.

Two evils grow out of short sessions of Congress: First, legislation by blackmail; that is, legislation is forced on bills contrary to the judgment of the Congress; and second, legislation is defeated which in the judgment of Congress should be enacted.

These have been the two evils which have brought the Senate, more than the House, into disrepute.

The constitutional amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska would prevent such a situation arising. No Senator could come on the floor and force the adoption of an amendment or else defeat the legislation which was pending. I think the complaints and criticisms which have been directed against Congress, and especially against the Senate, would be eliminated by the adoption of such a constitutional amendment as is here proposed. I do not know of a measure which has in it greater hope of bringing about a valuable reform of insuring honest legislation and the carrying out of the convictions and will of a majority of the Senate and the House than the measure now before us, which has been so persistently advocated by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

I have been astounded that the House of Representatives has repeatedly defeated the consideration and passage of the joint resolution proposing the constitutional amendment. I hope the pending joint resolution will be passed by the Senate and sent over to the House in time to enable the Members of the House, who complain of the Senate and of its delays and filibusters, to put it through, so as to prevent any recurrence in the future of the evils to which I have referred.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I have not any doubt that if the present President of the United States had the politicians here and those over yonder at the other end of the Capitol at home and could turn back the flight of time to about the 4th of March he would get great pleasure in leaving them at home. I thought, so far as I was individually concerned, that he was making a mistake in calling the extra session of Congress, and I so expressed myself to several people. Just coming into office, as he was, under the conditions and circumstances existing, I thought he would take nine months to put everything in good shape and working order, and then Congress would meet in regular session, instead of bringing Congress here in extraordinary session. I repeat, I think if he had it to do over, possibly that is the course he would pursue.

I am glad that the statesmen at the other end of the Capitol have each time seen fit to kill the political work of this body as exemplified in the pending joint resolution, and I hope there will be sufficient statesmen over there to kill it again as soon as it reaches their door.

The distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has just spoken of filibustering. Mr. President, I do not suppose filibustering was so bad when Thomas F. Bayard and Arthur P. Gorman stood upon the floor of the Senate for days and nights and filibustered to keep the heel of the negro from being placed upon the white man's neck in the South. I do not suppose filibustering was so bad when men like Henry Cabot Lodge, whose equal in brains and in intelligence has not been reached in this body for some years, stood here and engaged in a filibuster. I suppose filibustering was not so bad when John C. Calhoun, one of the greatest statesmen who ever sat in this body, engaged in filibustering. I do not suppose it was quite so bad when John Warwick Daniel, of Virginia, stood here and engaged in filibustering to keep again the heel of the negro voter from being placed upon the white women of South Carolina and Virginia and other Southern States. I think filibustering very often is very worthy; and it may be possible that the distinguished Senator from Virginia himself will be a filibusterer before this extra session adjourns if the House sticks to what it did yesterday afternoon between 6 and 7 o'clock p. m. And possibly it was not so bad to carry on a filibuster when, a few years ago, an antilynching law was brought into this body which would have been a disgrace and an insult to every white woman in the Southern States and in any other State of the American Union.

I shall not vote for this measure. I do not believe it is a good measure, and I have never believed it. I may be mistaken; I may have read wrongly; I may have been taught wrongly; but I do not believe the Senate and House of 1929 have, as a body, the brains and the intellect that was in the Constitutional Convention that wrote the Constitution of the United States of America. I know that South Carolina has not got it here, and I do not believe that any other State in the Union is represented here by a man who would be so egotistical as to stand upon this floor and state that he thinks himself a greater statesman than the men who wrote the Constitution of the United States of America. If there is such a man, I should like to see him. I will see that he is awarded a medal for being the greatest egotist that this country has ever produced.

Another thing I do not like, Mr. President, is this way of contemptuously referring to "lame ducks." I do not want to say anything to hurt anybody's feelings, but I should like to have somebody tell me if they consider that James A. Reed, of Missouri, was less worthy to represent Missouri on the floor of the Senate, after his 18 years of service, from December, 1928, until the 4th of March, 1929, than he was at any other time?

I should like to ask if any man will tell me that William Cabell Bruce, who sat here—the greatest scholar who has been in this body, so I have understood, since Henry Cabot Lodge left it—was any less worthy from December, 1928, until the 4th of March, 1929, or any less able to represent the State of Maryland than he was when he came here?

In this connection, Mr. President, I may say that William McKinley—in my estimation one of the best Christian Presidents this country ever had—was twice a "lame duck"; once in 1884, when his election was successfully contested after he had served in the House of Representatives up to that time; and again in 1890, when he was defeated for reelection to the House after the passage of the famous McKinley tariff bill. And yet this great man, whom some persons would call a "lame duck," was subsequently honored with two terms as President of the United States; and many other men of great talent have been defeated and later returned to the House and Senate.

I should like to ask, if I could do so without drawing comparisons and hurting anybody's feelings, if there are not some other States here that would admit that the men they have here to-day are not as competent and as worthy in some respects to represent their States as the men who formerly were here, because the men who are here to-day are new men. They have not had the experience, they have not had the training, they have not had the opportunity that their predecessors had. They may make greater men than the "lame ducks"; but who is more competent to represent this Government—those men, with their 12 and 18 years of service, from the 1st of December until the 4th of March, or a man who has just come here, with no experience?

As I say, I do not say one word against one of them, and I do not want any of them to think so; but it takes experience in this body, it takes age in this body, it takes men to study in this body; and I think one of the worst rules we have in it is this rule of seniority. I think the ablest man on a committee should be its chairman and not the man who has been there the longest; and there are other reasons why I think this joint resolution is a dangerous measure.

"Lame ducks!" Why slur a Senator who has sat here by calling him that? It reminds me of some people I hear talk in this same town about the "kids"—instead of calling them children, calling them "kids"—billy-goat babies! [Laughter.] I should imagine any man would hate mighty bad, if a doctor was at his home with his wife, and the man was pacing up and down the hall, if the doctor should come out and say, "Yes; your wife has come through all right. She has a kid"; and I am the same way about this "lame-duck" business. I do not believe in it. I think it is an insult to the woman and to the child, and I think it is an insult to the Senator and to his mother.

I do not know whether I shall ever be complimented by being called a "lame duck" or not, and I care very little, so far as that is concerned. It makes very little difference to me either way; but, if I should be, I certainly would go out of this Chamber with the full knowledge that I have more sense, more intelligence, and that I have profited by having the honor and the privilege of associating with the gentlemen here instead of going out and thinking that I was more ignorant than I was when I got here, and a "lame duck." I do not believe in those things; and I do not propose to sit here and let this joint resolution go through and not voice, so far as I am individually concerned, my protest against the reference to filibustering and against the reference to "lame ducks" as applied to Senators who are as able and as distinguished as any man in this body to-day.

Oh, it is said, "They were defeated." Why, yes; some of the best men in the world have been defeated. Wade Hampton was defeated in South Carolina. A man almost unheard of outside of his own State was sent here to take his place. That man is dead. You very seldom ever hear his name mentioned. The man whom he defeated will in a few days have a statue placed in that hall out yonder to commemorate his memory as one of the greatest sons South Carolina ever had.

Gen. Matthew C. Butler was defeated—another very able man and a very distinguished man. He was defeated by Benjamin R. Tillman, who came here and served longer than any man from South Carolina, I think, with the exception of one, has ever served. Was Senator Butler, after 18 years of service, any less worthy to represent that State? "Lame duck!" Yes; he was lame. He had only one leg; the other one was shot off in the Confederate war, leading a cavalry charge in the defense of the Southern Confederacy.

I could mention other States in the Union where the same thing occurred; but, as I say, I do not wish to hurt anybody's feelings. I do not wish anybody to think I am drawing comparisons; but you can think in your minds of men who have gone out of here and have been succeeded by men who lacked a whole lot of being as brainy as the ones they succeeded. Why slur them as "lame ducks"? Why say that they shall be so spoken of?

Another thing, Mr. President: Some people want to change the Constitution at every little whim; it does not make any difference what comes along. That is so in my State, I am sorry to say. We have some people in South Carolina who say, in connection with everything that comes up, and some one says they think it is unconstitutional, "Well, let us change the constitution. Let us switch it about and change it around."

If the Constitution needs amending, if we think we have the brains to put more in it than is in it, if we think we have the intellect to write a greater law than that, let us call a constitutional convention like men; let them assemble here in Washington; let them write a constitution of the up-to-date variety, and let them write a constitution to suit the Power Trust. Let them write a constitution to suit the Newspaper Trust. Let them write a constitution to suit everybody. Let them bow down to every power and to every little sniffle whim, and change the Constitution of the United States to suit some condition that happens to appear to-day.

I say we should stand by the Constitution. We can pass laws to correct any evil that the Constitution has failed to correct. I never heard anybody make any speech about it that has offered any suggestion that would improve it.

Oh, yes; they put in the whisky amendment. I have not anything to say about that. Everybody knows my position on the whisky business. I put an article in the RECORD here yesterday from one of the "big Ikes" of the prohibition movement in which he said there was more crime in this country to-day than in any country in the world where we were spending our money to send missionaries. I see, under the constitutional amendment, young boys and girls drinking whisky at public entertainments. Very recently I saw two beautiful girls and two very handsome boys come into a dining room. They sat down at the table. The waiter came up, and one of the boys deliberately reached back in his hip pocket and pulled out a silver flask, wrapped it up in his napkin, and passed it to the waiter. The waiter carried it out of the dining room, and came back in a few minutes to these people, sitting right at the table near me, with four highballs. They drank that. In a short while that was repeated. When the young man went to pay his bill, this waiter came back and had this flask wrapped up as he had carried it out. The boy put it back in his pocket, paid his bill, and two boys and two girls from two of as good families as there are on this earth walked out of that dining room staggering.

I never saw that before the Constitution was amended. I never heard a girl ask a boy when she started out with him if he had anything on his hip before the Constitution was amended. There are a good many other things I could call attention to; and I say that you had better let that old Constitution alone as it was written. Pass your laws if you want to; then, when emergencies arise, you can change them to meet that issue.

The Constitution has been changed in another particular—woman suffrage. Mr. President, I am not so sure that they did such a great piece of work when they did that. I lack a good deal of giving my full support and my hearty congratulations to woman suffrage when I see some things that are going on to-day. Down in my State some people said, "Oh, yes; woman suffrage has passed now. Such-and-such a class of women"—what they call the aristocrats, the "big Ikes"—"would not go to the polls." They said, "Oh, the southern women would not vote. They were not going to register." What happened? They were the first ones that went. Many of the farmer boys' wives and the cotton-mill boys' wives refused to register in South Carolina. They said they were not going to vote. I have heard men make the statement that if their wives registered and voted they never could eat at their table any more; they did not propose to marry a woman or live with a woman who wanted to go around and mess up in politics and mess about with the men all over the country. They said they would not do it.

Now, what did I have to do? I had to go around among my folks and tell them, "Why, you are acting foolishly. These opponents of ours over here, these people on the other side, are all registering. For instance, a fellow over yonder has a wife and two daughters and himself, voting 4 votes, and you are sitting over here with your wife and two daughters and yourself and you are just voting 1 vote." Finally I convinced them that if the other side was going to vote our side must vote; and then I got to the Senate. [Laughter.] Still, Mr. President, I do not give my approval to that change.

If I had my individual way, I would cut the woman suffrage and prohibition amendments out of the Constitution and leave each State of the American Union to do as it pleased about such matters. If I had my way, I would put woman back on the pedestal where she belongs—at home, the mother, God bless her; high above everything else on this earth, too far superior to some men even to look at them, much less to touch them. If this country is saved, Mr. President, it will be by the women and at the family altar.

Woman is the greatest creation that God ever made, and the proof of that is that all of His creations were in the ascending scale, and He made woman last. That is high proof of the fact that she is the grandest and the noblest of them all. I would love to see her stay in the high place where she belongs.

If it had not been for the woman suffrage amendment, Mrs. Willebrandt would not have left her job and gone home broken-hearted and disappointed. If it had not been for that amendment, some other good folks who will be put on the scrap heap would never have been drawn out of their homes to be looked at for a while and admired and then discarded because their political acts, or something else, did not please some little Ransy Sniffles running around carrying messages.

I know this resolution will not pass the House. I call on the statesmen over in the other body to kill this resolution again, and to keep it killed, and let the Constitution of this Government stand, and let us abide by it. If we would abide by it closely and make less effort to change it, this country would be a great deal better off from every standpoint.

As I have said, I know the resolution will pass in the Senate. I can not help that. I can only voice my own sentiments about it. I hope that when it does pass here, however, the statesmen of the House will rise in their majesty and set aside the acts of the politicians.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported to the joint resolution.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen	Glenn	Norbeck	Thomas, Idaho
Bingham	Goff	Norris	Townsend
Blease	Harris	Nye	Trammell
Bratton	Hastings	Oddie	Tydings
Broussard	Hatfield	Overman	Tyson
Burton	Hawes	Phipps	Vandenberg
Connally	Hebert	Ransdell	Wagner
Couzens	Heflin	Reed	Walcott
Cutting	Johnson	Sackett	Walsh, Mass.
Dale	Kean	Schall	Walsh, Mont.
Deneen	Keyes	Sheppard	Warren
Dill	King	Shortridge	Waterman
Edge	La Follette	Simmons	Watson
Fletcher	McKellar	Smith	Wheeler
Frazier	McMaster	Steck
Gillett	Metcalf	Stelwer
Glass	Moses	Swanson

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BINGHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. BURTON rose.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the Senator from Ohio if he desires to proceed this afternoon. If so, I shall be glad to yield the floor for the present.

Mr. BURTON. I shall be entirely willing to go on at this time if that is agreeable to the Senator.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I rise to support this resolution. It seems to me very clear that the fundamental principles of popular government will be promoted by the adoption of the amendment proposed. I do not regard it as necessary to make any extended remarks, as the Senate has on previous occasions passed a resolution similar to the pending resolution.

There are several fundamental facts which it might be well, however, to mention. In the first place, the present arrangement as to the meeting of the Congress and the inauguration of the President was due to conditions entirely different from those which now prevail—the absence of rapid means of transportation; the absence of any method for the ready transmission of news; a custom, quite universal at the time, of giving to those elected to public positions ample time for the adjustment of their own private affairs in preparation for a considerable absence. The Continental Congress, on the 13th day of September, 1788, providing for the selection of presidential electors and Representatives in Congress, fixed the first Wednesday in January for the selection of electors in the respective States, the first Wednesday in February for the electors to assemble and vote for President and Vice President, and the first Wednesday in March for commencing proceedings under the Constitution.

The first Wednesday of March of the succeeding year, 1789, was the 4th of March, and by an act passed by Congress in March, 1792, it was provided that the terms of President and Vice President should close on the 4th day of March after election. That was the manner in which that date was fixed, and it has been continued from that time to this.

With the very great difference in modern conditions, it can be seen that there is no reason for the long interval between the election and the induction of the President into office, and more especially is it true that there is no reason for the long interval between the election and the first Monday in December of the following year before the Congress shall meet.

I wish to call attention to the custom in divers other countries in regard to the time after the election when a legislative body meets. In England the Parliament usually convenes in two or three weeks after election. I believe the 25th of June has been fixed for the meeting of Parliament at this time, slightly over three weeks after the election.

In Canada there is no definite time fixed by law, but the time has generally been short, conditions being analogous to those prevailing in England.

In France the Chamber of Deputies, in the case of a new election, is convened within 10 days following the close of the election.

The German constitution of August, 1919, provides that the Reichstag shall assemble for the first meeting not later than 30 days after the election.

In Hungary the date of assembly is within six weeks; in Australia 30 days after the day fixed for the return of the writs of election.

In Brazil the interval is somewhat longer. Elections are held on the first Sunday in February, except when they occur in the same year with the elections for President and Vice President, which are held on the 1st of March. Congress must assemble May 1. In the first case there is an interval of three months, and in the second of two months. The conditions which exist in Brazil are somewhat similar to those which existed in the United States in the days of the formation of our Government. The Netherlands State Assembly must convene within three months. The Polish Parliament must convene on the first Tuesday after election. In Argentina the elections take place on the first Sunday in March, and the constitution requires Congress to meet on May 1.

There is nothing like this long interval in the constitution or laws of any State of the Union. The usual time for the meeting of the State legislature after the November election is at a very early date in January. It seems to me the custom sanctioned by our present order of things is altogether incongruous. Congress could itself, by legislation, remedy the existing order of things except for the fact that any such legislation would, contrary to the wording of the Constitution, shorten the terms of the President and Vice President, shorten the terms of Senators, which by the Constitution are fixed at six years, and by implication shorten the terms of Members of the House of Representatives.

I might mention one reason for the later meeting of Congress which did exist until the passage of the amendment for the popular election of Senators, and that is that in most States—though there were some exceptions as there was for a time in the State of Ohio where the election was the second January before the Senator took his seat—the election of Senator was held in the early part of the year following the general election. That made it practically impossible for the Congress to meet early in January following the November election.

While no illustration has been stated of what might happen under the present system, nevertheless it is possible that if one party should be in power at the date of the November election and that organization should be dislodged by an adverse vote, under the present system with the Congress meeting for the short session from December to March following the outgoing Congress and administration could enact legislation which would make it utterly impossible for the incoming administration, at least for the first two years, to follow out the mandates of the people.

Mr. President, I believe I have nothing more to say on the subject. It seems to me the present system is entirely incongruous, is not in accordance with the best ideas of popular government, and, if we mention the matter of popular support, that the change has the overwhelming support of the people of the country.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, first I want to express my thanks to the author of the resolution, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], for the great courtesy that he has shown me on two or three occasions, when the matter might have come up and I was kept from the floor of the Senate by other business, in not pressing it.

On yesterday there was a very solicitous inquiry on the part of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] as to my whereabouts. I am sorry that he is not in the Chamber at this time, for I would like to tell him that I was making a speech in Massachusetts. I am sure that he would sympathize with me under the circumstances.

The proposed amendment to the Constitution which has passed the Senate several times has had a rather interesting history. With it there has been coupled the agitation for a change in the date of the inauguration of the President. That has gone along with the movement to change the time of the sessions of Congress. There have been many attempts to change the date of the inauguration and they have been based mainly upon two grounds: First, in order that the inauguration date might come at a more favorable season of the year.

Those of us who were in Washington when President Taft was inaugurated will remember the terrible storm that took place, which caused a great deal of illness and several deaths. Those of us who were here on March 4 of this year will remember the sympathy we had for the noble red Indian who was so lightly clad and rode a horse in the cold, cold rain. It has been felt that it would be wise if we could have it at a time when we would be more likely to have better weather in Washington.

The other reason is that it is believed by some that it would be wise to have the President's term fit logically into the plans for changing the beginning and ending dates of the meeting of Congress. Of course, as has been said repeatedly by opponents to the amendment to the Constitution, it is not necessary for an amendment to the Constitution to take place in order to change the date of the meeting of Congress. That can be done by law; and a great many of the arguments which have been raised in regard to the date of the meeting of Congress and the necessity for an amendment to the Constitution on that account fall by the wayside in view of the fact that Congress could change that law.

It may be of interest to Senators to remember that in 1876 a resolution was introduced in Congress to change the date of the inauguration to May 1. In 1886 an attempt was made to change the date to April 30, so as to have it fall on the anniversary of Washington's first inauguration. In 1889 another amendment was introduced fixing the last Tuesday of April as inaugural day, it then occurring on April 30 of that year, the object being to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of Washington's first inaugural.

It is worth noting that since 1889, 81 amendments have been presented in some form or other attempting to change the date of Inauguration Day. Eighteen of them have designated April 30 as the date, 5 have designated the last Wednesday in April, 14 the last Thursday in April, 2 the first Tuesday in May, 22 some date in the early part of January, as is done in the resolution now before us, 19 designating a day in the latter part of January, and 1 the second Monday of December.

Although March 4 has generally proven itself a bad day, as Washington newspapers told us recently in working out the history of the weather on that date, and frequently the weather has spoiled ceremonials and pageants attendant upon the installation of the new President, the difficulty of any change of date has been in the inability of Congress to agree on any specific date in the spring as being more certain to furnish good weather than any other date.

In the consideration of Senate Resolution 83 on May 10, 1898, after that very distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, the late Senator Hoar, had spoken of the inclement and disagreeable weather of the preceding inaugurations and had pleaded for the more agreeable date provided in his resolution, which called for the last Wednesday in April, Senator Perkins, of California, showed by reports from the Weather Bureau that from 1873, when the Weather Bureau was established, until 1897, inclusive, the year before Senator Hoar's speech was made, the only advantage of the last Wednesday in April over the 4th of March seemed to be that on three of the April days there were high winds and threatening weather instead of snow or sleet, whereas the other days matched up quite evenly with good and bad.

Another objection to the last Wednesday in April or any particular day of the week is that it would cause a change from term to term in the exact number of days in the term of the President. The Constitution states that the President's term shall be four years, but as the week days by name advance from year to year, the term of one incumbent would be less than four years while, of course, his successor would have more than four years.

In answer to the contention of those who have sponsored this and other similar resolutions that it would obviate the difficulties and inconvenience consequent upon March 4, it was shown that in about 200 years that date occurred on Sunday but six times, this infrequency being ascribed to the peculiar results attendant upon Inauguration Day coming in the year following leap year.

There has been much discussion in Congress as to whether it is necessary to change the date of Inauguration Day by a constitutional amendment, the Constitution proper specifying no exact date for the inauguration. Those in favor of the constitutional amendment maintain that since the President's term was fixed at four years by the Constitution, an extension or curtailment of that period, which would be necessitated by a change in the inaugural date, could only constitutionally be effected by an amendment.

During recent years the resolutions seemed to tend to have the President's term end sometime in January, irrespective of weather conditions. This seems to be due to the fact that in nearly all our States the governors are inaugurated as early in January as possible, so as to begin their terms as early in the calendar year as may be. It is also due to the fact that in unusually severe weather the inaugural ceremony can be held in the Senate Chamber, as was done on March 4, 1909, when Mr. Taft was inaugurated.

An interesting objection to having the inauguration occur in January was presented in the Sixty-eighth Congress in the minority report opposing the passage of the House joint resolution. This minority report declared that as the President, by reason of the intensive campaigning, is subjected to severe physical strain prior to the election, and as after the election he is compelled severely to exert himself in preparing his message to Congress, supervising the Budget, planning governmental policies, selecting the Cabinet, making speeches, and answering a great mass of correspondence which always falls to the lot of a newly elected President, it is dangerous for him to take up the burdens of the presidential office only two months after election. The present system, which permits four months' preparation, is more humane.

Senators will remember that the present occupant of the White House took occasion during the four months' period between his election and his inauguration to go on a good-will journey to our sister Republics to the south. There seems to be no question whatever that this trip was of mutual advantage both to the President and his country and to the other countries concerned. They all recognized him as the new man in office. In the South American Republics there is no particular interest at any time in the President who is going out of office. The new man is the one to whom all honor is paid, and they appreciated very greatly his visit. They felt that it gave them an opportunity to present matters to him which they would never be able to present in such a way and under such favorable circumstances to an actual President, and they welcomed his visit as being a sign of his interest in the Latin-American Republics, and it did a great deal of good. It is to be hoped that it might be repeated in the future.

At any rate there is certainly much weight in the position which has been taken that following the strenuous election and with all that must precede a President's immediate induction into office, to give him no vacation at all, but to bring him practically immediately after election into the busy days of picking out his Cabinet, writing his inaugural address, preparing his Budget, collecting his advisors and meeting all the thousands of callers, office seekers, and friends, and those who have some message which they would like to incorporate in his inaugural address, would be a very unfortunate thing.

The history of resolutions on this subject indicates the impossibility of a constitutional amendment ever being adopted merely for the purpose of furnishing a pleasant day for inaugural ceremonies, since there is rightly so much objection to tinkering with the Constitution. It is probable, however, that in adjusting the congressional term, a subject previously discussed, the date of the inauguration will be changed for the benefit of the new plan finally chosen, and this was done in the last four resolutions on the subject which passed the Senate.

Before taking up a discussion of those, Mr. President, I should like to read a portion of the remarks made by Mr. TILSON, the Representative from the third Connecticut district, and the majority leader of the House, at the last session when a joint resolution, virtually the same as the one now before us, was being debated by the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the junior Senator from Utah?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator give the date of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD where the address from which he is reading may be found?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have the matter in the form of a reprint, I will say to the Senator, but it was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Thursday, March 8, 1928. I am sorry that

I have not the exact page of the RECORD here, because the reprint from the RECORD has been differently paged. Mr. TILSON said:

Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of sincere regret that I find myself in opposition to a report and recommendation of one of the fine committees of this House.

May I say at this point, for the information of the Senate, that the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who has just spoken in favor of the joint resolution, had the duty of presenting the resolution to the House, of which he was then a distinguished Member. But referring to what Mr. TILSON said:

I should not allow myself to take this position if I could by any proper means bring myself to support the proposition recommended. This is not a party matter, however, in any sense whatever, but it is a matter which each Member must square with his own conscience, and this is what I must do. Hence my attitude.

Changing the time for the meeting of Congress is not the most important matter in the world. During all the 140 years under the Constitution no Congress has ever deemed it a matter of sufficient importance to even legislate upon the subject, although during all those years Congress has had full, complete, unlimited power to legislate and to fix as the date of meeting any day in the year. If it be a matter of so great consequence that Congress convene on any particular day of the year, why was not the discovery made long years ago and that day selected by an act of Congress?

I am sorry that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] does not happen to be in the Chamber, because I should like to ask him—perhaps some of the Senators here present can answer the question—whether there has ever been introduced into the Senate any proposed legislation seeking to change the date of the opening of Congress without changing the Constitution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the junior Senator from Utah?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. When one of these resolutions was under consideration several years ago I offered a bill as a substitute for the resolution then pending which called for a change of the date of the meeting of Congress. Aside from that, I am not advised as to whether any other such measure has ever been offered. I submitted that bill not because I deemed there was any great necessity for the change but as a foil to the measure which was being urged, because I was opposed to the constitutional amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Can the Senator from Utah tell us what became of his bill?

Mr. KING. My bill was offered at the same time the resolution was under consideration, and, of course, it received but little consideration. It did not go to a committee, and I did not ask that, because I saw how futile it would be with the predetermined view of Senators to urge the adoption of a measure which would mitigate some of the supposed evils that existed under the present system, evils which I do not admit are sufficient to warrant the adoption of a constitutional amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Did the Senator from Utah offer his bill as a substitute for the joint resolution?

Mr. KING. I have forgotten the parliamentary procedure. I think I offered the bill as a substitute for the resolution, although I am not sure. If I did so, no vote was taken upon the motion to substitute the bill which I presented for the resolution which was then under consideration.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to say to the Senator from Connecticut that probably one reason why a bill has not been introduced to change the time for the meeting of Congress is that under the constitutional limit as to the terms of the President, Members of the Senate, and Members of the House, it would be difficult to fix a time to better advantage than that now provided under the Constitution as it is. But if the amendment were adopted with the latitude as to sessions in the winter and the summer, a change in the time of the meeting of Congress after the beginning of the terms of the Members of the House and of the Senate would be much more feasible. The reason why it probably has not been done is that without a change in the limitation prescribing the beginning of the term on March 4 and its ending on March 4, it was difficult to arrange the time.

May I point out to the Senator that when I was a Member of the House I was a member of the committee which had jurisdiction of the measure, and we tried to frame a statute to change the time of the convening of Congress. The reason the time was not changed was that unless the session was limited to the 4th of June, assuming that it would begin on the 4th of March and end on the 4th of June, it would run into the hot weather, and there seemed to be a pretty well-founded conviction that if we considered legislation during the very hot months it would not be as satisfactory or be as conducive to the best results as if Congress were in session in the wintertime, nor would it be as possible to keep the attention of the Senate and the House on legislation under consideration. For that reason that plan was abandoned; but it has been considered by practically all of the committees recently which have had to consider this proposed amendment. It has not been introduced in the form of a bill because it was difficult to arrange the time with the terms commencing on March 4 and ending on March 4.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the Senator tell us what position he, himself, favors?

Mr. TYDINGS. At that time I did not favor the amendment to the Constitution, although I took no position upon it, because we never had a vote on it while I was in the House. I did write a minority report, which set out the possibility of making the change by statute; but even in that report, if I remember correctly, I did not oppose the amendment. I stated that I was in favor of what the amendment sought to accomplish, but thought if we could accomplish it by a statute rather than by an amendment, we should use that means of procedure.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator.

May I ask the Senator from Nebraska whether there has ever been before his committee a proposal to change the date for the meeting of Congress by statute?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think there has been. Bills to that effect have been introduced several times, but, so far as I know, none has ever been reported out of the committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. Would the Senator mind telling why the committee did not report any of them?

Mr. NORRIS. I can only speak, as the Senator from Maryland has, of my own idea of it, which I think was also the idea of the committee, that they did not consider it a practical proposition. An amendment to the law to be effective would have to provide that Congress should meet on the 4th of March, or at least not earlier than that, in order to convene the new Congress in session. Some bills have been introduced providing for two different dates for the convening of the two sessions of a Congress, making the first session of a Congress convene on the 4th day of March, and the other session of the same Congress, the last session, at a different time. For instance, we could by law provide that the first session of Congress should begin on the 4th of March—that would be an unlimited session—and the next session should begin, as it does now, on the first Monday in December, and that session could run then over to the 4th of March. However, that arrangement would retain the old Congress in existence after an election for one session of Congress.

May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question while I am answering his question, if I have answered it?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. When does the term of the Governor of Connecticut begin?

Mr. BINGHAM. My recollection is that it begins on the Wednesday following the first Monday in January.

Mr. NORRIS. It begins early in January, it is safe to say?

Mr. BINGHAM. As near the 1st of January as possible.

Mr. NORRIS. When does the term of the members of the legislature who are elected in November begin?

Mr. BINGHAM. On the same day.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the case in my State, except the term begins on Thursday instead of Wednesday.

Can the Senator not see an analogy between that and the Federal Congress and the President? Would the Senator be in favor in his State of having the governor take office on the 4th of March and of providing by law for the old legislature to begin its session in December after the election, although the successors to the members of that legislature had been elected?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, of course there is a very great difference between a small State of a million and a half people, with a limited amount of business which must come before the State legislature, and a government of 120,000,000 people. There is a great difference between the governor, with the limited number of appointments which he must make, and the President with thousands of appointments.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator think that that is another reason why we ought to adopt the proposed constitutional amendment? In the case of the Federal Government there is so much more business to transact than it is necessary to transact in a State such as Connecticut, does not the Senator think that we ought to get at it a little bit quicker in order to transact it? Does the Senator see any reason why the Federal Congress should hold a session after their successors have been elected that would not apply to the Legislature of the State of Connecticut?

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, Mr. President, I have never been convinced that any harm has come from the method which we have followed for over a century. The fact that Congress has delayed meeting after the election as long as it has has never done any serious harm. Furthermore, it has given opportunity for a more careful preparation on the part of Members of Congress; it has given an opportunity also for more careful preparation for his work with Congress on the part of the President, except in cases where the President has called an extra session, and whenever, in the opinion of the President, it has been absolutely necessary for Congress to meet promptly an extra session has been called. The Senator will remember that during war times Congress was in session nearly all the time.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I realize that. It seems to me that is another reason why we ought to adopt some machinery similar to this amendment, if not the amendment itself, because of the magnitude of the business that the Federal Government has.

I remember that 25 or 30 years ago, when I first came to Congress, it was not deemed necessary to close your house at home. You spent more than half of your time at home. But as the public business accumulated and became greater it was necessary for Congress to be in session most of the time, and Members of Congress had to spend more of their time in Washington than they did at home. Is not that one reason why it is important that the new Congress, instead of waiting 13 months before it goes to work, should get to work as soon as possible, as your legislature does in Connecticut? Is it fair to a Member of the House of Representatives to say that more than half of his term shall have expired before he is sworn into office? Yet that is what happens.

Mr. BINGHAM. On the face of it, of course, the Senator from Nebraska is correct; but the answer to that is, in the words of Congressman TILSON, from whose speech I have just been reading, that if the situation were as bad as it seems, the Congress might have changed it a long while ago by act of Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Connecticut a few moments ago made inquiry as to whether a bill had been introduced dealing with this question. I stated that at one of the former sessions I had introduced a measure which I thought substantially met the points that were contemplated by the Senator from Nebraska; and, with the permission of the Senator, I should like to call attention to the bill, and what I stated at the time it was introduced.

I may say that I introduced the bill some time in March, 1924. The bill reads as follows:

> That the first annual session of each Congress shall be upon the 6th day of April next following the election of such Congress; the second annual session of Congress shall be upon the 2d day of January next following; and the third annual session of the Seventieth Congress and of each alternate Congress thereafter shall be upon the 2d day of January next following the appointment of the electors of the President and the Vice President.

A few days afterwards, and when a joint resolution similar to this one was under consideration, I submitted these observations:

> I offered this measure for the purpose of avoiding, if we possibly could, a constitutional amendment, as I am very much averse, in the language of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Reed], to constantly tinkering with the Constitution of the United States. In support of this measure, and as a reason for it, I ask to be permitted to offer a few observations.
> The Constitution provides that—
> "Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day."
> The bill to appoint the days for the annual sessions of Congress fixes the date for the first annual session upon the 6th day of April next following the election of such Congress, and the date for the second annual session upon the 2d day of January next succeeding. Provision is also made for a third session on January 2, following the election of the President of the United States, this short session before the end of a presidential term being necessary in order to canvass and declare the vote of the Electoral College for the President and Vice President. This short third session will only be held by alternate Congresses.
> The four months intervening between the election in November and the inauguration of the President in March is not too great a time to enable the outgoing President to clear up the work of his administration and to afford the new President time to select his Cabinet and prepare for the assumption of the duties of the presidential office. The short session of the old Congress preceding the change in administrations will also be of advantage for disposing of pending business.
> But the interval of 13 months between the election and the first annual session of Congress is too great, and the bill shortens this interval to five months. This interval could be further shortened by providing for the election of Congress in January, which might also cool the judgment of the people. The new Congress assumes office on the 4th of March, and one month later, on the 6th of April, meets in regular session. This affords the new President one month for the preparation of his message and is as early a date as would be proper for the assembling of Congress.
> April 6, 1789, was the day upon which the first Congress assembled in the city of New York, canvassed the vote of the Electoral College, declared that George Washington had been chosen President, and organized the Government of the United States under the Constitution. This date, April 6, instead of March 4, should have been accepted as the date for the beginning of the terms of office prescribed in the Constitution, as the Government under the Constitution, both in the de facto and dejure sense, had its beginning upon that day.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, if I may continue, I should like to read a little further from a speech of Congressman TILSON, made on the 8th of March, 1928, when a resolution similar to the one now before us was being considered by the House. He said:

> While fixing the date on which Congress shall meet is not of vital importance, changing the Constitution for this or any other purpose is a serious matter. Of the amendments adopted since the first 10—which were to all intents and purposes a part of the original Constitution—some were unnecessary, some have not worked as expected, some have worked badly, and some have not worked at all.
> Doubtless I am somewhat old-fashioned in this respect, but I have a deep, sincere affection and admiration for that old document, and I hate to see it changed without the best of reasons. Our experience in changing this precious instrument has not been such as to encourage further experiment along this line, except for reasons clear and compelling. I do not believe that the reasons given for the proposed change are sufficient or convincing, but, on the contrary, that when analyzed they become untenable.
> What are the alleged reasons for adding the proposed amendment to the Constitution? The one argument upon which the demand for a change in the meeting date of Congress is based is that the time is too long between the election and the meeting of the new Congress. Looked at superficially, this is a plausible argument, especially when made to appear that 13 months must elapse after the election before the newly elected Member actually takes his seat; but even this formidable charge can be met and readily answered. In the first place, this charge is not true as I have stated it and as it is usually stated. Under our present Constitution only four months must elapse before the new Member may take his seat. Any longer time than four months is only because Congress, in its wisdom, has not seen fit to fix March 4 as the date for the new Congress to meet. Then we are called upon to pass a constitutional amendment in order to have Congress meet 60 days earlier than it could otherwise. And even then, in the case of a new President, he will not come in for 20 days longer, so that in reality the new Congress will gain only 40 days by meeting January 4 instead of March 4.
> But we are told in all seriousness that it will never do for the new Congress to meet as late as March 4, which can be done by a simple resolution, because that would mean running into midsummer, and it is hot in Washington during June and July. Shades of our illustrious predecessors! Shall we amend the Constitution of our country in order to avoid a few days of personal discomfort?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like to finish Mr. TILSON's speech.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to interrupt Mr. TILSON's speech. He is speaking now, and I want to ask his representative here a question about it.

It is not true, as alleged there, that we want to avoid the hot weather; but it is true that Senators and Representatives who want to change the meeting date to March or April are running us into the hot weather.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] with his bill, and the Senator from Connecticut in advocating that it ought to be done by an amendment of the law rather than an amendment to the Constitution, are the people who are insisting that we should run into the hot weather. They are admitting, I think, that too long a time elapses between the election and the actual swearing into office; and when they admit that it seems to me that they have admitted themselves out of court. They have admitted, then, taking the present conditions, that the Members of the old Congress are going to legislate after their successors have been elected—a condition that does not exist in any State of this Union or anywhere else in the civilized world; not even in the State of the Senator from Connecticut or the Senator from Utah. Neither one of them would go into his State and advocate such a condition, and yet they are defending such a condition in the Federal Government.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, Mr. President; and we are defending it because, although it does not exist in any other country "in the civilized world," it has existed for over 120 years in the country that we believe is the most prosperous and the leading country in the world to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator believe that between the election of any official and his going into office 13 months ought to expire, in order to give him a cooling-off season?

Mr. BINGHAM. It seems to me that the burden of proof lies on the Senator from Nebraska and not on me to show wherein the United States has suffered from the practice which now prevails.

Mr. NORRIS. That has been shown over and over again. I can show it again; but I ought to satisfy the Senator from Connecticut by stating that his own State does not follow such a foolish practice as that, and he has never advocated a change in his own State. If he loves it so well, he ought to be in Connecticut telling his constituents, "You ought to elect your governor and your legislature in November, and not permit your governor to take office or your legislature to be sworn in until a year from the following December."

Mr. BINGHAM. I know that my good friends the people of Connecticut will feel very highly honored to have the Senator from Nebraska place them in the same position as the people of the United States as a whole; and I am sure that the governor will feel highly honored to know that the Senator from Nebraska regards him as being the equal of the President, and therefore that their terms of office should be identical, and that what is good for one is good for the other.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad. I am also glad to bear testimony to the people of Connecticut that they ought to insist that the Federal Government should do the same with its officials as they insist on doing in Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, so far as I know the majority of the people of Connecticut never have been in favor of this amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Nebraska ascribed to me a desire to have Congress sitting during the hot weather. May I say that, having been in the Senate for 12 years and having participated in many hot-weather sessions, I am not very much averse to them. Speaking for myself, I rather like warm weather in preference to cold. But, speaking now seriously, under the scheme which I have suggested—and it is not novel by any means—Congress has the power by legislation to determine when it shall meet. It may provide for the convening of Congress on the 1st day of April—April fool's day—and it would then have April, May, and June for legislation, without projecting it into the hot-weather period; and, if necessary, of course it could sit during July.

There is no necessity of our waiting until December. Congress has the power now, without amending the Constitution of the United States, without tinkering with it, to advance the meeting of Congress after the election in November until the 1st day of April. I think meeting on the 1st day of April, as we would have the authority to do by congressional enactment, we could obviate some of the evils of which my learned and dear friend complains, and would satisfy substantially, I think, the needs of the people, even with the progressive views which my friend possesses and with which I have so much sympathy.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say, in the same spirit in which the Senator from Utah expressed himself about the hot weather. He says he has been here during the hot weather so often, and seems to like it. That explains to me clearly why the Senator is not more religious than he is. It makes plain also why, since I have been through several of those experiences myself, I am more religious than I used to be before I came to Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I want to avoid that kind of dilemma, especially if it goes through eternity.

Mr. KING. Mr. President will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I was not quite through.

Mr. KING. I just want to say, the Senator from Nebraska being such a profound theologian and being so wonderfully religious, I shall be very glad if he will advise me and the other Senators how we may obtain some of that fine fervor which he possesses, instead of going down to Bishop Sims, as I have so often done.

Mr. NORRIS. It depends on how far the Senator has advanced in his religious ideas. He may have reached such a stage of education along religious lines that it is proper for him to go to Bishop Sims, and he may have gone beyond Bishop Sims's theological views, and would have to have a different kind of instructor to get any benefit. But, Mr. President, it is a serious matter to legislate in Washington, or any other place, during the hot season. No matter what we may think about it, that is not the time when we do good work. That is the time when Members of Congress may die if they insist on working. That is the time when we send men to the hospital. That is the time when we have to attend senatorial funerals on account of hot weather. A man can not do good work, especially mental work, when the weather becomes unbearable, as it does in this city. It is only a fair sample of what is going on all over the United States.

All our States are providing and have provided for the meeting of their legislatures in January, early in January, soon after election. The men who are elected in December take office in January. The men who are elected to transact the business of the Nation wait 13 months before they are sworn into office, and Members of the House, before that time arrives, are in the midst of a campaign for renomination, another reason why they can not do good work. They are not able to go before their own constituencies and say, "Here is my record, and upon that record I stand." They have not made any record. They are in the midst of a campaign for renomination before they have even been sworn into office. In the meantime men who have been defeated, perhaps, are legislating.

If it should come to a time when the House of Representatives was to elect a President of the United States because of the failure of an election by the Electoral College, under the present conditions the President would be elected in part by men who had been defeated for reelection. A new Congress will be elected during the campaign in which the presidential candidates are seeking the votes of the people, but if the Electoral College should fail to elect a President, it would not be the new Congress that would elect the President, it would be the old one, some of the Members of which had been defeated for reelection, possibly half of them, on the issues in the campaign. The President they would elect would go into office for four years, notwithstanding the fact that in the campaign fought out before the people it might be that the theories of government represented by the man elected would be rejected by the people of the country.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will be glad to yield in just a moment; but before I yield I would like to make this observation: That the matter to which the Senator from Nebraska has just referred, namely, the matter of the necessity of having the Representatives elect a President following an election of the sort implied, would be quite likely to bring into being a House of Representatives unable promptly to elect a Speaker. If my recollection serves me, there have been occasions when the House went for a considerable number of weeks before they were able to organize, and if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska should become a part of the Constitution, and the House of Representatives should meet on the second day of January after the election, and the term of the President should end 13 days later, on the 15th day of January, and the House of Representatives should have been unable to organize in that time, then it would be impossible to elect a President, and yet the term of the retiring President would have expired.

I yield now to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. NORRIS. Will not the Senator from Michigan permit me first to refer to the particular point the Senator has made?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. In the meantime the election of a Vice President would have been thrown into the Senate, and if the House failed to elect the President and the Senate elected a Vice President, that Vice President would become President, just the same as the Vice President would now in case of the death or disability of the President.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, Mr. President; but if my recollection serves me, the Senate of the United States took some weeks to organize only a very few years ago.

Mr. NORRIS. No; the Senate of the United States never failed to organize, as far as the Senate was concerned, sufficiently to vote on the question of the election of a Vice President, if there had been any necessity for that. No such instance has ever occurred, and the Senator must remember that under the Constitution, in the case he puts, where the House has failed to elect, the Constitution provides that the Vice President shall be elected from the two highest on the list, and that the Senate shall elect him. The Constitution itself provides for a Presiding Officer of the Senate, the Vice President of the United States. It is not necessary for the Senate to elect a President pro tempore. He is not a constitutional officer. They could go on and elect a Vice President, and it would be practically an impossibility for them to be tied up, because they have to select a Vice President from the two highest on the list. The only time when there would be any difficulty about that would be when there was an absolute tie in the vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has indicated that he has found no period of menace involved in this presidential interlude between elections in November and inaugurations in March. I wanted to remind him that the chief initial crisis in the Civil War occurred between the election of Lincoln in 1860 and his inauguration in 1861. The Confederacy was formed on February 4 and elected its President on February 9. He was inaugurated on February 18. I am wondering whether the Senator does not feel that the Nation's situation thus was tragically complicated, and that results might have been more safely handled if the strong hand which was to succeed to the Presidency a few weeks later had been actually in control of the ship of state, as would have been the situation under the amendment urged by the Senator from Nebraska. Was not that interlude and that state of flux in the Government desperately hazardous at that critical moment? Was not that a period of poisonous menace?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska would not do away with an interlude. There would be an interlude between the election the first week in November and the inauguration of the President in the middle of January. There would be an interlude of two months and more. Of course, what the Senator from Nebraska and those who think with him have in mind is something like the British system, the working of which we have just seen within the last few days, where, an election having taken place, and it being evident that the party in control of the Government had lost its majority, the Premier immediately resigned, and the King called into office a new Premier, and a new cabinet is formed, and within a very few days the new Government goes into effect. That may have its justification, but that is not even what is proposed here.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The proposal here at least is to reduce the span of the interlude, and the Senator has been indicating that there is no danger in that interlude.

I will ask him, bringing the matter down a little closer to date, to contemplate another situation. If, for the sake of the argument, President Wilson had failed of reelection in 1916, and there had been a new administration pending in 1917, would not the fact that we found it necessary to break off our diplomatic relations with Germany on February 3, 1917, which was right in the middle of the interlude, have precipitated an extremely delicate and serious situation which would have caused complications that we would have given almost anything to avoid? Would it not have been supremely embarrassing for an outgoing President to have handled the challenge in Germany's unrestricted submarine warfare which began on February 1?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not any more so than if the complications had arisen on the 1st of December.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But they did not; they happened to arise in both instances within the static period that would be cured by the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. BINGHAM. But they would be just as likely in the future to arise within a week or 10 days after the election.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then the Senator's answer is that because we can not cure the whole thing it is not wise to cure any of the trouble.

Mr. BINGHAM. My answer is that there is no serious danger in the present situation; that we have functioned under this arrangement for 122 years and have prospered; and although on the face of it the arguments appear to lie with the Senator from Nebraska, it seems to me that actually the very fact that nothing serious has occurred, and that we have enjoyed the benefits of the arrangement proposed by the fathers and never changed by the Congress, show the wisdom of the present arrangement.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me one more exhibit?

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like to finish reading Mr. TILSON's speech, but I do not think he has any objection to being interrupted further.

Mr. VANDENBERG. My recollection is that the Mexican crisis broke in 1913 in precisely the same interlude, and, unless my memory plays me false, President Taft specifically stated to the country that he felt it would be unfair to his successor to deal affirmatively and aggressively with the difficulty then involved because of the fact that he was on the final lap of his term and was not entitled to bind his successor, whereas if he had been free to act with affirmative effect, that situation might not have been permitted to drift into the difficulty which subsequently occurred. Does not the Senator think there is some possibility of advantage in that direction, at least through a reduction in the span of this interlude, and thus a reduction in the period of jeopardy?

Mr. BINGHAM. Again the Senator proposes something which might just as well have happened in the early weeks of November.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Except that it did not.

Mr. BINGHAM. The only solution which would suit the Senator would be the English system, so that as soon as an election was held the new government would take office. But that has not been our plan, and we have not actually suffered from what the fathers laid down.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one further question?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. Do I understand the Senator to take the position that he wants to wait until some disaster of that kind does occur before he will give his consent to a new system which might obviate it?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I think the advantages of the present system far outweigh the possibilities of disaster which the Senator from New Mexico so gloomily contemplates.

Mr. BRATTON. I should like to hear the Senator portray them.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I will continue to read from the speech of Mr. TILSON in the House of Representatives on the 8th of March, 1928:

> The practice in foreign countries of early assembling is cited, but there is no real similarity, and any argument based on such an analogy is not well grounded but is altogether misleading. In other countries governments fall and cease to function, carrying in their fall both executive and legislative authority, which are not separated, so that a new government must be formed to carry on. There is no such thing in our system of government. Our executive and legislative powers are distinct and our terms of office are fixed by law or the Constitution. And, on the whole, has not the plan worked reasonably well, even as compared with foreign countries?
> But it is not necessary to amend the Constitution in order to have an early meeting of the new Congress, and if it be believed that this is what is needed and what the people are demanding, let it be done by an act of Congress. As it stands to-day, Congress can fix any date of meeting it may deem best; and if it should turn out that the day fixed is not the best date, it can be changed and go back to the old date that has served satisfactorily throughout our history. But once fix the date by the Constitution, and it must stand whether satisfactory or not, whether it work well or ill.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Would the Senator agree to fix a time to vote?

Mr. BINGHAM. I should prefer not to do so at this time.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator could not be persuaded to do that?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will remind the Senator, my distinguished leader of whom I am very fond, that this matter was brought up in my absence by unanimous consent, and if anyone should call for the regular order it must give way to the regular business.

Mr. TILSON continued:

> Let us consider for a moment whether any real harm comes from postponing the date of convening the new Congress even the full limit of 13 months. We are now under a Budget system and it is working well. During the summer and autumn the President, through the heads of executive departments and the Director of the Budget, prepares the estimates of the several departments and makes up the Budget. It is sent to Congress the first week in December. As at present, the old Congress is organized and before January 4 is well under way in the consideration of the supply bills. The Cabinet heads, who under the outgoing President have submitted their estimates, now come before the committees of Congress and explain each the portion of the Budget which relates to his department. Before March 4, if Congress attends to business, all the supply bills and other necessary legislation is passed, and the old Congress and the old President, with his Cabinet heads and their assistants, all go out together. The new President comes in on March 4 with a new Cabinet and assistants and begins at once to prepare for the new estimates and the new Budget to be submitted in the autumn.

Meanwhile, the new Congress on and after March 4 stands ready to meet in case of need to pass emergency or any other legislation deemed necessary for the public interest. Time after time the new Congress has been called together early for one reason or another, and there is no danger that the public interest will ever suffer for want of a Congress ready to serve.

Let us see what would be the situation under the proposed amendment. The old President and his Cabinet must make up the Budget as before, but can not submit it before January 4. It is then submitted to a new Congress, not thoroughly organized and without committees. Meanwhile the "lame-duck" President holds on for 20 days. Whether he delivers a message on the state of the Union to the new assemblage, now cleansed of its "lame-duck" contamination, is not specified in the resolution.

Having organized—if no deadlock interferes—and counted the electoral vote, if there is time, the now pure congressional aggregation, out of deference to the new President soon to come in, will probably twiddle their thumbs until January 24 arrives. And now work must begin—on the supply bills, at any rate. A new Cabinet will have taken the place of the old and without time to learn anything whatever about their several departments, with no knowledge whatever of the estimates or the Budget, they must appear before the committees of Congress to explain and defend the provisions of their several bills. The new President must take on faith the Budget of his "lame-duck" predecessor, for surely he is not in position to make up one of his own; and so throughout the first year of his term, the most important year of all for him, the benefits of the Budget system may be nullified, so far as he is concerned. Can you imagine anything worse than such a situation? And yet I have not in the least overdrawn what must inevitably happen in case this amendment should be ratified.

Right here I should like to interrupt the speech of Mr. TILSON to remind the Senate of the fact that he speaks as one having had very long experience in Congress and as one who has been the majority leader in the House, now in his third term as such, he speaks with authority.

Continuing to quote from his speech—

Can we afford to take such a step which, once taken, can not be retraced? It matters nothing to me personally. It matters little to any of us older Members, whose time here after this amendment is in effect at most will not be long; but it does matter very much to the people of the country through all the years to come and to those who follow us here in giving service to the country. I have one boy of my own, dearer to me than my own life, as every father will understand. He is only a schoolboy now, but in the dreams of a fond father touching his son I have seen him standing here in my place, giving himself to the service of his country as his father has faithfully tried to do. I would not for this right arm do anything by my vote that would make his path more difficult or render his service and that of the others who will then stand where we now stand less effective or useful.

I can not vote for this resolution. Neither can I allow it to pass without giving voice to my opposition and utterance to my conviction that its adoption will be an unfortunate mistake which those responsible for it should never cease to regret. And remember, when we give our vote for it and send it on its way all the harm of which it is capable throughout the years to come will have been done, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter from a distinguished attorney of the city of Washington, Mr. Phil P. Campbell, addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, which was written in regard to the resolution which passed the Senate in the last session and which was similar to the one now before us. Because it puts in very convincing language the argument against the resolution, I ask that the clerk may read the letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

HON. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

Re House Concurrent Resolution No. 18, proposing change in date of convening of Congress and inauguration of President.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This resolution tinkers with our governmental structure at its most vital part. The Constitution provides for a representative government by sober second thought. The proposed amendment would give us government by first impression. It approaches a democratization of the Republic—a dangerous adventure. As a republic we may endure; as a democracy we could not. If even our smallest political subdivision, the school district, should attempt to operate as a democracy, it would result in discord and failure, with less and less chance of success as political subdivisions enlarge. Congress, with ample opportunity for its Members to think, after their election, before they are called into action, has grown for 140 years in the confidence of our own people and in the estimation of the world. The State legislatures, whose members go into action before they have had an opportunity to think of their duties as lawmakers, or of the kind of laws that would be beneficial to the people (as the resolution proposes Congress shall do), are gradually losing their once proud place in our political system.

There are many reasons why this resolution should not be agreed to. The strongest reason against it is the principal reason urged for it. It is urged that Members of Congress sometimes fail to secure the enactment of legislation in which they are interested as a result of filibuster in the closing hours of the short session, a session in which some Members take part who are not to be Members in the next Congress. More serious complaints should be established against the short session than flippantly calling it a "lame-duck" session, or that it has within recent years made it possible for a Vice President to save himself from the obscurity that usually falls to the lot of the occupant of that office, by raising an issue against filibuster. The record of the short session of Congress throughout our history fully vindicates it. Many of our most salutary laws have been enacted during the short session. And it may well be that the defeat of one law may be as great a service to the country as the enactment of another law. Advocates of the resolution indeed would have difficulty in pointing to serious injury to the country from failure of the enactment of laws. The personal disappointment of the author of a bill that fails is not generally shared by the people. Anyhow, it should not be necessary to have a constitutional amendment, changing many provisions of the present Constitution and a score of legislative enactments in order to prevent filibuster in one of the coordinate branches of Congress.

It is stated in support of the resolution that State legislatures meet soon after the election of their members. Attention should be called in this connection to the many ill-considered laws that are enacted in large numbers growing out of temporary conditions, conditions that often adjust themselves before the laws are printed. It is entirely safe to say that it would greatly improve the nature and wisdom of our State laws if the members of the legislature were required to wait a year before going into action, thus giving time for temporary conditions to adjust themselves, and for the members to think of themselves as lawmakers rather than as partisan politicians in a campaign for election. It would result in fewer and better laws and the States would hold their place of honor and responsibility in our political system.

It is also urged that Congress should meet as soon as possible after election in imitation of the parliamentary governments of Europe. These parliamentary governments differ from the constitutional government of the United States. They go to the country when the party in power fails to get a majority vote on a major question. But even so, as in the case of the State legislatures parliamentary government in Europe in many countries is a sad disappointment. In a notable instance—I refer to France—the many failures of the parliamentary government were so grievous that chaos and national calamity were averted only by the national assembly yielding its functions to a premier with the powers of a dictator. In two other countries, Spain and Italy, parliamentary government so completely failed as to make it possible for dictators to walk in and seize power. All this is current history.

In this connection, also, it is well to recall that the convening of Congress soon after election, as often happens when a new President calls Congress in extra session and submits suggestions for legislation growing out of conditions incident to the campaign for his election, that the Congress enacting such laws as he suggests is defeated at the next ensuing election. The people on second thought repudiate what may well be called campaign legislation.

It has been asserted in support of the resolution that war would have been averted in the sixties if President Lincoln would have been inaugurated in January instead of March. Such speculation does injustice to the seriousness with which the people of the Southern States considered the questions involved in the assertion of their rights at that time. Indeed, it is more reasonable to speculate that war would have occurred in February instead of in April if President Lincoln had been inaugurated in January instead of in March. But it is not at all improbable that war would have ensued if there had been an attempt to inaugurate a President of the United States in January, 1877, as a result of the Hayes-Tilden election in 1876. The time between the date of the election and the following 4th of March enabled Congress by extra constitutional means to avert a national calamity. Again, in the case of Jefferson and Burr, there was a controversy that threatened the dissolution of the Government. It has been said that the country escaped from civil war only by the cooling-off process that the lapse of time brought about in Congress. If the inauguration of a President had been attempted in January instead of in March, it is morally certain that war could not have been averted and that the young Republic would have gone upon the rocks.

The one great purpose and the ill effect of the proposed amendment is to speed the politician in hot haste from the political forum to the legislative chamber to enact more laws. The need of the country is not more laws, but less. The facilities for enacting laws are now so ample that our books are filled with them, so that no man can number them, much less understand them or meet their requirements.

The demand for this resolution is in response to an insistence by a persistent minority that began some years ago to insist upon the constitutional amendments and the enactment of laws for the regulation and control of every activity of mankind. Since then many constitutional amendments have been agreed to, volumes of laws have been enacted by municipalities, State legislatures, and the Federal Government in response to the noisy demands of this minority. One of the serious results is the expenses of State governments have increased from 150 to 1,665 per cent, and the expenses of the Federal Government have enormously increased. Rapidly increasing from year to year the expense of the Government to the people of the United States last year—1927—was over ten and a half billions of dollars. The proposed amendment to the Constitution would facilitate the enactment of additional legislation of the same kind, that would result in vexing the people and in enormously increasing their already too heavy burdens of taxation.

The dangers to the country in the proposed amendment are so great that if it is agreed to, another amendment to the Constitution becomes all-important. As a partial security to the people, if this amendment is submitted, another should be submitted along with it providing that no law of a general character that directly or indirectly effects the purse or the normal life of the people shall become effective until it has been submitted to and ratified by the people at the next ensuing election. Such a provision would help to save the people from the hasty enactment of laws immediately following political campaigns.

If the resolution is acted upon it should be so considered as to allow ample time for mature deliberation and debate. The subject matter of the resolution is of greater importance than any question of legislation.

Very truly yours,

PHIL P. CAMPBELL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to a very able speech delivered in the House of Representatives by the Representative from the fourth district of Connecticut, Mr. MERRITT, with regard to a similar joint resolution to the one now before us, which was before the House at the last session of Congress. Mr. MERRITT said:

Mr. Chairman, during the past 10 years the attention of the country, so far as the Constitution is concerned——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator from Nebraska is very fond of interrupting Members of the House when they are having their remarks read, but I have no objection to yielding, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator is not engaged in a filibuster, will he not permit the remarks which he is about to read to be printed in the RECORD for the second time; they are already in the RECORD? If he is simply carrying on a legitimate debate, does he insist on reading the entire CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I am not engaged in a filibuster, and I should like to make some comments on the address of Mr. MERRITT as I go along.

Mr. MERRITT said:

Mr. Chairman, during the past 10 years the attention of the country, so far as the Constitution is concerned, has been so much taken up with the eighteenth amendment, commonly known as the prohibition amendment, and the nineteenth, known as the woman suffrage amendment, that little attention has been paid to the far-reaching effect of the seventeenth amendment, which provided for the election of Senators by popular vote. This amendment, with the very general adoption throughout the country of the direct primaries for nominations, marked, in my opinion, the most far-reaching departure from the basic ideas on which the Constitution was founded which has occurred in the history of the Nation.

I am not bold enough, and it is not necessary before this House, which contains so many eminent constitutional lawyers and students, to discuss in detail the story of the Constitution. But all will agree that what the founders intended to produce was a representative Republic and not a strict democracy. The arguments which were used to change the method of election of Senators and change the method of nominations were that the changes would give the people more direct voice in the election of their representatives, and also that it would do away with the influence of individuals and corporations of great wealth in the choice of Senators and Representatives.

I think it will be conceded that whether or not these changes have made the action of the people more direct, the result has not been any substantial improvement, but perhaps rather the reverse, in the average character of the Members of the other body. Certainly the seventeenth amendment has not removed either the influence of individuals and corporations of great wealth, but rather has made it impossible for men without great wealth of their own or who are not backed by great wealth to conduct a primary campaign in any of the large States.

Most, if not all, the scandals which have occupied the attention of the country in connection with the election of Senators in the past few years have been connected with direct primaries.

I mention these facts for the purpose of illustrating the danger of changes which alter or tend to alter the frame of our Government, which was founded by men of great wisdom and who were profound students of the history of government throughout the world. Assuming, as I think we safely can assume, that human nature has not fundamentally changed, we can not safely ignore the teachings of history.

A reading of the Constitution and the debates of the Constitutional Convention will show that the founders were anxious to provide proper checks and balances not only to preserve the rights of individuals against the action of government and the rights of sovereign States, but also the rights of minorities against oppression by majorities.

They also intended to guard against hasty legislation and to provide for due consideration of measures before they should be passed. The result of their labors was to produce a Constitution which has been the admiration of the world, and under which this country has grown from a union of weak and straggling colonies along the Atlantic seaboard into a nation of continental extent and with more than a hundred millions of people. It has provided a stable local government by sovereign States and an efficient central government by an indestructible union of those States.

At that point I should like to call attention to the fact to which Representative MERRITT refers—that one of the great merits of the present system is that it prevents hasty legislation and affords an opportunity for due consideration of measures before they shall be passed. It often happens in the history of countries operating under the parliamentary system, where the voters are wrought to a great pitch of excitement by the election, that the results of that election are immediately translated into statutes, frequently to the great disadvantage to the country, whereas, with us the very fact that a long period of time intervenes between the election and the normal meeting of the Congress gives opportunity for cool consideration and mature thought and prevents the enactment of hasty and ill-considered legislation.

I continue reading from Mr. MERRITT's speech:

What I am contending for is that with this history of 150 years, and knowing the dangers and the troubles which have come from several of the amendments which have already been made in the Constitution, the least that can be said to-day is that those who propose changes in the Constitution should, in the first place, be able to show actual evils and actual harm which have come to the Nation by reason of existing provisions and prove also that their suggested change would not only cure evils they allege but not produce other evils in their place which may be even greater.

So far as I have seen, the arguments on which this proposed amendment is based are, first, that a new Congress should meet almost immediately after its election to carry out any supposed mandates of the people; and, second, that evils may occur in the present short session from so-called lame ducks. As to the first argument, if there is any mandate from the people which should be promptly carried out, history has shown that in case of a great emergency, like the World War, party lines are obliterated and any Congress will, as a matter of course, carry out the policy of the ruling administration and the mandates of the people.

(At this point Mr. BINGHAM was interrupted by Mr. MCKELLAR, who raised a point of order.)

Mr. BINGHAM subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the remarks of Representative MERRITT be printed in the RECORD in the place in my speech when I was interrupted by the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter is as follows:

But supposing that, even in time of peace, there should be a very distinct overturn in the membership of Congress, and supposing that the then existing Congress, under present arrangements, should not be willing to vote in accordance with the results of the election, the greatest necessary delay under existing conditions would only be 60 days, because the President could call an extra session, as was done several times during the war, to meet on the very day after the Congress in office had ended. And it is inconceivable that a delay of 60 days, except in case of war, when it could not possibly occur, would be of any importance to a great nation. It should be pointed out here that, as a matter of history, overturns in Congress have usually occurred in the midst of a presidential term, there having been many instances where the majority of Congress and the President did not agree. This was anticipated by those who founded the Constitution and was intended as a matter of conservatism so that the policies of the country should not be rudely and frequently overturned, as they appreciated might be the case if we followed the continental system of making the Executive dependent on the legislature.

As to the second objection, about the danger from the presence in Congress of lame ducks, I am not aware of any serious or lasting injury which has ever happened to the Nation because of them.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Is the gentleman aware that three presidential elections in the House of Representatives were determined by lame ducks? I refer to the election contests between Burr and Jefferson, and John Quincy Adams and Jackson, and Tilden and Hayes. Does the gentleman think that was a fair proposition, to let lame ducks participate in that election in the House?

Mr. MERRITT. I said I was not aware of any lasting or serious injury that would happen, or that had happened.

Mr. CELLER. Was not that lasting and serious?

Mr. MERRITT. It was not. It appears to me that in ordinary times it is an advantage to the country that the newly elected Congress should not meet for several months after it has been elected. With modern methods of communication, favoring, as they do, all kinds of propaganda, it is easy to stir up popular movements which, on further consideration, may prove to have no just basis. It is much better, after the excitements of an election are over, to have time for careful consideration of matters which have been agitating the public mind. There is not the slightest fear that general public opinion which persists will not be duly embodied in the law.

There are a number of instances where hasty legislation has caused great confusion and, I believe, harm to the Nation. But, as I have said before, I am not aware of any case where delay in legislation has caused any lasting injury.

With the changes to which I have referred, which have been in the direction of strict democracy and direct action by the people, the necessity for reasonable delay and reasonable consideration of important measures has greatly increased.

Where a man has been through an intense campaign, first in the primary for the nomination and then for an election in a congressional district and, still more, throughout a whole State, his attention and energies have naturally been centered on winning votes for himself. Under these circumstances there is a great temptation to advocate measures and to make promises which will attract the greatest number of votes, and these measures under such conditions will be framed not primarily because of their wisdom or not because they appeal to the judgment of the candidate himself but, on the other hand, they will be such as lend themselves to some popular slogan and which appeal to the masses.

After an election of this sort not only do the people themselves need some time to consider the questions more calmly but a successful candidate will after a few months be better qualified to form a cool and unprejudiced judgment if he has to consider the matters which he so glibly supported during the heat of an election when the catching of votes was the great consideration.

It is certain that history has not shown that referendum votes are governed by the calmness or reason which should govern a Representative in the consideration of his vote which directly affects the law. And therefore, as I have said, after the excitement of a great popular contest and election the country and Members of Congress would be better for a considerable delay before beginning their actual work of lawmaking.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. As a matter of opinion, does not the gentleman agree that the other things contemplated in the proposed amendment ought to be remedied and remedied now?

Mr. MERRITT. I will speak of that later. Let me repeat my last sentence.

So far as I have been able to observe, there has not been in the country at large any strong opinion or decided movement for the change in the Constitution which is now under consideration. It seems to have been based on purely theoretical grounds which has no basis in history or in fact; that is to say, no evils have been shown, and the country has suffered no harm from the present practice, and therefore there is no cause for any change. The movement has been pushed by a persistent and active minority, who base their argument on suggested evils that may occur, and it has been acquiesced in to some extent by those who think that it probably will do no harm.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. LOZIER. Do I understand the gentleman's position to be that the American people, after they have considered and voted upon a proposition, have no right to have their will written into law under our system of government, and that a Congress which has been rejected shall serve as a wet nurse for the American people for a period of 13 months? Is that the position of the gentleman?

Mr. MERRITT. The old Congress goes out in three months.

Mr. LOZIER. But under the present system the American people have no absolute right to have a session of Congress reflect their will for 13 months after the election?

Mr. MERRITT. They have under the Constitution, if the President thinks best.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If Congress wishes to do it, Congress can provide for a new Congress to come in on the 4th of March?

Mr. MERRITT. They can.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Which will only mean a difference in time, as provided in the proposed amendment, between a date in January and the 4th of March.

Mr. MERRITT. Yes; less than 60 days.

Mr. LOZIER. And will it not save the damage that a Congress can do that has been rejected by the American people?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has again expired.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Is it not provided in the present Constitution that in case of a national necessity the President may call Congress in session on the 4th of March?

Mr. MERRITT. It is.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I suggested that since the Sixty-fifth Congress the average turnover has been 12 per cent of the Members of the House?

Mr. MERRITT. That is true.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And of that turnover fully 70 per cent has been by voluntary retirement?

Mr. MERRITT. That is true.

But no change in the Constitution should be undertaken on any such grounds; that is, on the theory and on the ground that no harm may result, because history has shown that changes have produced evils which have not been anticipated and that therefore any additional changes should be based only upon the proof of positive present evils and upon sound reasons for hoping for future benefit. In this case, in my opinion, the reasons both from history and from theory are against the adoption of sections 1 and 2 of the joint resolution.

There may be some reason for the adoption of sections 3 and 4, although the country has thus far suffered no harm from the absence of these sections, but conceivably there might be confusion under certain conditions set forth. But they form no necessary or inferential reasons why sections 1 and 2 should be adopted.

I hope therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the joint resolution, and especially sections 1, 2, and 5 thereof, may be not adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield for a question, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to make a point of order. I do not suppose that it is necessary for the Senator from Connecticut to yield for that purpose. I presume I have a right to make a point of order and that is what I desire to do.

Mr. BINGHAM. I presume that a point of order may be made at any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee will state his point of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is that under Rule XI—

When the reading of a paper is called for, and objected to, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, without debate.

I desire to object to the reading of the speech; and I call the Presiding Officer's attention to page 263 of the rules, which is a part of Jefferson's Manual, as follows:

For the same reason, a Member has not a right to read a paper in his place, if it be objected to, without leave of the House. But this rigor is never exercised but where there is an intentional or gross abuse of the time and patience of the House.

A Member has not a right even to read his own speech, committed to writing, without leave. This also is to prevent an abuse of time, and therefore is not refused but where that is intended.

I do not mean to say that what the Senator is doing is a gross abuse, but it certainly is an effort to consume time. After a Congressman has prepared a speech and put it into the RECORD, or where he has delivered it on the floor of the House and it has been taken down and printed in the RECORD, and every Senator has had an opportunity to read it, and where there is no point in the world in reading a speech except to take time, it seems to me that if that rule is ever applicable it surely is applicable now. So I object to the reading of the Congressman's speech, and make the point of order that under the rules it is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). In the opinion of the present occupant of the chair, Rule XI applies to the reading of papers from the desk by the Secretary or clerk. It has been held again and again that Jefferson's Manual is not a part of the Rules of the Senate, and it has been held again and again that Senators may read from papers in connection with their arguments on the floor; therefore the present occupant of the chair holds that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I have always understood that the opinion held by the present occupant of the chair was the opinion generally held by the Senate. I am reading this speech of Mr. MERRITT's for more than one reason. In the first place, it was delivered in the last Congress and quite a number of the Members of the present Senate probably neither heard it nor read it. In the second place, a great many Members of the Senate do not have time to read that which occurs in the House. This was the first speech in a long time to be delivered against the amendment; and being made by a gentleman of the standing of Congressman MERRITT, and putting the arguments in a way which appealed to me, it seemed to me eminently fitting for the Senate to hear it at this time, and particularly for the newer Members of the Senate to have a chance to read his remarks. And in view of the fact that my very good friend the Senator from Tennessee has implied that I am doing this merely to take up time, and not for the proper information of the Senate or for the purpose of influencing the Senate in legislation of a very important nature now before it, may I say that this resolution was brought up very suddenly, and I did not have the opportunity to prepare myself as I should have liked to do. I supposed that it would come up normally some day in the morning hour following an adjournment, and in that case I should have had time the better to prepare my remarks. It was brought up to-day unexpectedly, however, during my temporary absence from the floor under unanimous consent. Accordingly, Mr. President, I call for the regular order, and then I shall yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order having been demanded, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, Senate Resolution 37.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Barkley	Glenn	Moses	Smoot
Bingham	Goff	Norris	Steiwer
Bratton	Harris	Nye	Townsend
Brookhart	Hatfield	Oddie	Trammell
Burton	Hawes	Overman	Tydings
Capper	Hebert	Phipps	Tyson
Connally	Heflin	Pine	Vandenberg
Couzens	Howell	Reed	Wagner
Cutting	Johnson	Sackett	Walcott
Deneen	King	Schall	Walsh, Mont.
Dill	La Follette	Sheppard	Warren
Edge	McKellar	Shortridge	Waterman
Fletcher	McMaster	Simmons	Watson
Frazier	McNary	Smith	Wheeler

Mr. HEFLIN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BLACK] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that Senate Joint Resolution 3 be laid before the Senate; that 30 minutes after it is laid before the Senate the Senate shall proceed to vote upon its passage; and that the 30 minutes before the vote is taken be given to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, that course, I understand, would prevent any other Senator from making a few remarks if so disposed, would it not?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If all the time should be consumed by the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is in doubt whether such a unanimous-consent request can be entertained under the circumstances. Under the rule a request for unanimous consent to fix a time for a final vote should be made, and then a roll call taken. However, in the absence of objection, it may go on.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In order that I may fully understand the request, I do object until I understand more thoroughly the situation. It may well be that some Senator might desire to speak 3 or 4 or 5 minutes on the proposed amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to preclude any Senator who may desire to speak, if there is such.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Why not fix the time at an hour?

Mr. NORRIS. I will change the request and ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, that Senate Joint Resolution 3 be laid before the Senate, and that a vote be had upon it after debate not to exceed one hour.

Mr. REED. Of which the first 30 minutes will be given to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. NORRIS. Of which the first 30 minutes shall be given to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, this very great generosity, giving me 30 minutes in the middle of the luncheon hour, is something I fully appreciate, but I would scarcely take up any time at all at that hour of the day. My only object in speaking on the joint resolution was not to filibuster against it, as has been so courteously implied by the Senator from Tennesee and the Senator from Nebraska, but rather to bring the matter to the attention of the new Senators, who have not heard the previous debate and who have not committed themselves on the measure. I assume that the great majority of the Senators who voted in favor of the joint resolution during the last session, and the session before, and the session before that, will see no reason for changing their votes, and that the only hope those of us who are opposed to the measure may have is that of winning the support of a few of the Senators who have not listened to the debate previously or committed themselves by their votes.

I would have no objection whatever to entering into an agreement if I might have the opportunity of speaking the first thing Friday morning. I shall promise not to take more than half an hour if I may be recognized at that time for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. I will change the request. I ask unanimous consent that on the convening of the Senate Friday, day after to-morrow, the unfinished business, if any, shall be temporarily laid aside, that Senate Joint Resolution 3 shall be laid before the Senate, that the Senator from Connecticut shall be given 30 minutes to debate the question, and that the Senate shall vote upon it one hour after it is taken up.

Mr. REED. Not more than one hour?

Mr. NORRIS. Not more than one hour.

Mr. McNARY. May I say this to the Senator: If my opinion is sustained, the House conferees will to-morrow present to the House the farm relief bill in the shape of a conference report, and it is my intention to call it up for consideration in the Senate as quickly as it is received here. I do not expect it before 3 o'clock on that day.

Mr. NORRIS. The order under this request would expire at 1 o'clock.

Mr. McNARY. Very well; I have no objection to fixing 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wants to get the matter straight in its mind——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Why not make it applicable to to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The form of the unanimous-consent agreement submitted by the Senator from Nebraska might be contingent upon the fact whether the Senate adjourned or recessed to-morrow until Friday.

Mr. NORRIS. I hardly think so, if we had that unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Nebraska to couple his request with the condition that the Senate should take a recess from to-morrow until Friday.

Mr. NORRIS. If it will help the Chair any, I will ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of business to-morrow the Senate take a recess until Friday at 12 o'clock; that at that hour the unfinished business, if any, shall be temporarily laid aside and that Senate Joint Resolution No. 3 shall be laid before the Senate; that a vote on the passage of the resolution shall be had not later than one hour after it is laid before the Senate; and that the first 30 minutes of that time shall be given to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I want to thank the Senator for his courtesy in changing his unanimous-consent agreement and to say that I hope the Senate will agree to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

RECESS

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, June 6, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, June 5, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

While our days are passing by, our Heavenly Father, we praise Thee. How lovingly Thou dost brood over Thy children. The glories of Thy kingdom are love and joy and rest. Thy mercy, O God! The amazing wonder of it! Time does not breathe upon it; it stretches far beyond the tomb and the cloud. How the thought stirs and rejoices us. Merciful and gracious, here and now and forevermore. Hear us, Father. By candor and by courage may the right prevail to-day. Renew our strength and freshen our intellects by fellowship with the good, the true, and the beautiful. In the name of Jesus our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 1648. An act to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended.

The message also announced that the Senate has passed bills, a joint resolution, and a concurrent resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1142. An act to continue, during the fiscal year 1930, Federal aid in rehabilitating farm lands in the areas devastated by floods in 1927;

S. 1312. An act to amend sections 182, 183, and 184 of chapter 6 of title 44, of the United States Code, approved June 30, 1926, relative to the printing and distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD;

S. J. Res. 5. Joint resolution amending the act entitled "An act authorizing the erection for the sole use of the Pan American Union of an office building on the square of land lying between Eighteenth Street, C Street, and Virginia Avenue NW., in the city of Washington, D. C.," approved May 16, 1928; and

S. Con. Res. 13. Concurrent resolution to print and bind the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall of the statue of Wade Hampton, presented by the State of South Carolina.

SENATE BILL AND CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED

A bill and concurrent resolution of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 1312. An act to amend sections 182, 183, and 184 of chapter 6 of title 44 of the United States Code, approved June 30, 1926, relative to the printing and distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; to the Committee on Printing.

S. Con. Res. 13. Concurrent resolution to print and bind the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall of the statue of Wade Hampton, presented by the State of South Carolina; to the Committee on Printing.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. J. Res. 61. Joint resolution to amend the appropriation "Organizing the Naval Reserve, 1930";

H. J. Res. 82. Joint resolution making appropriations for additional compensation for transportation of the mail by railroad routes in accordance with the increased rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

H. J. Res. 84. Joint resolution extending until June 30, 1930, the availability of the appropriation for enlarging and relocating the Botanic Garden.

ARTICLE BY HON. CHARLES G. EDWARDS, OF GEORGIA

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article written by my colleague the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS] on the subject of the battle field of Gettysburg.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, under consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following article written by my colleague, Mr. EDWARDS, of Georgia:

[From the Savannah Press]

A VISIT TO GETTYSBURG

All my life I have wanted to go through the battle fields in Virginia and over the one at Gettysburg. In returning to Washington recently, accompanied by my family, it was our pleasure to see a great many of the battle fields in Virginia. Last Sunday, accompanied by Mrs. Edwards; our son, Beach Edwards; a niece, Miss Evelyn Edwards, of Claxton, and my very dear friend Judge CHARLES R. CRISP, we drove from Washington to Gettysburg to see the battle field at that place, which marked the high tide of the Confederacy and which was the point farthest north reached by the Confederate soldiers during the war between the States.

This is said to be the best-marked battle field in the United States and perhaps in the world. It covers approximately 16,000 acres, and to see it all one has to drive several miles, which we gladly did, under the direction of a guide. We were quite fortunate in getting a good guide. I forgot his name, but he is the son of a Union soldier who was wounded in the Gettysburg fight. This guide seemed quite fair toward the South, and only twice riled our party by referring to the war as the "rebellion."

Judge CRISP's distinguished father was a Confederate soldier, and so was mine. That he might not make any mistake and say things he should not, we let him know we were from Georgia, which furnished her share of troops to the Confederacy, and that we were both sons of Confederate veterans. By the way, digressing just a bit, the elder Crisp, who was later Speaker of the National House of Representatives, and made for himself a large place in the history of American politics, entered the Confederate service when he was but 16, and was in prison for six months, most of the time at Fort Pulaski, where he was almost starved to death, he having told his son that a "house cat was a delicacy when one could be gotten." So it will be seen that the Union forces did not feed or care for their prisoners so well.

Gettysburg is about 100 miles from Washington. The roads are paved all the way and quite good. We went out by the way of Rockville and Frederick, Md., through a beautiful rolling country, and on to Gettysburg. The town of Gettysburg is an old town. It was a town of only 3,000 in 1863, when one of the fiercest battles ever waged was fought in and around it.

My father, the late Hon. Thomas J. Edwards, entered the Confederate service quite young—he was but little more than a boy of 18. He served the entire time in Wheeler's cavalry. He had five brothers who wore the gray, two of whom were killed in battle and another who was severely wounded lived a few years and died as the result of wounds he received at Gettysburg. The brothers were not in the same commands. My mother's brother, Rev. W. M. C. Conley, served through the entire war and had often told me of leaving his tracks from his bare and bleeding feet on the rocks in the "valley of death" at Gettysburg. He had told me how the battle had raged, how the Confederates won for the first two days, and then how on the third day the tide turned and Pickett's men were slaughtered; how there had been some confusion in the orders given General Longstreet, and how the Louisiana Tigers charged the batteries of the Union soldiers and had been mowed down by artillery. I had heard stories as a child from my father, my uncles, and other brave men who wore the gray, and I had read history books and accounts of the cruel and unfortunate war; but my visit to Gettysburg brought it so close to me that I could find myself listening for fear the firing that had ceased all these years might start again, and somehow a fear crept over me, as the guide told us so graphically of the battle and showed where Meade stood and directed the forces of the Union troops; and, by the way, where a magnificent equestrian monument stands in his memory; and as he pointed across some open fields to a point on a small hill, in a clump of woods, where the beloved Lee, on old Traveler, stood, where the State of Virginia has erected a magnificent monument to Lee and his horse.

Lee and his horse, Traveler, were both beloved by his men, and so it occurred to me it was a monument to both of them. There are but two—just two—monuments there to the Confederates—the one I have referred to that reflects great honor upon Virginia and one by the State of Maryland to a Maryland regiment. The troops from the latter State were about equally divided between the Union and Confederate forces, and so Maryland has erected two monuments—one to her sons who wore the blue and one to her sons who wore the gray. I was glad to see these monuments, but pained to find there were no more there to the Confederate soldiers. North Carolina is just now preparing to erect one to the memory of her sons who fought there. Georgia had many sons there—many of them who fell asleep during the battle in the "valley of death"—they sleep a long, glorious sleep. They fell in the land of the enemy, in the thick of battle, they died fighting for Georgia and the South. Gordon, the most commanding figure on horseback I ever saw, was there, and there were Longstreet, Thomas, Wright, and other great Georgians. It thrilled me when the guide had us stop and pointed to a bronze marker upon which was written language indicating that the spot upon which it stood was the position of Gen. John B. Gordon. It was not far from where Lee stood. From the spot where Gordon stood, one can look a short way across the line and see the beautiful stone and bronze monument erected to the spotless Lee riding his beloved horse Traveler. Along the line the cannon are arranged as they were during the battle.

The battle opened on July 1; it went all through the 2d and up to 4.30 o'clock in the afternoon of July 3. The first two days were won by the Confederates. The Union soldiers were routed and driven back through the city. Meade ordered fresh troops and supplies and gave battle again on the 3d. I will not go into the question of the mix-up in the Longstreet orders. There are questions about that. One thing is certain. If they wanted Longstreet and his men to cross that open field in the face of the battery of 72 large guns and the other engines of death, I can not, at this calm period, much blame him for not wanting to go into that death trap. Just what the plans were I will not attempt to relate, for I have what approaches a reverence for all the Confederate officers and soldiers and I do not want to be misunderstood. I am not criticizing anyone, for they were there that awful day, July 3, and they knew what was taking place and what took place, and, of course, they did what they thought and knew to be best, all of them, God bless their noble memories. Down in my heart, I thank God I was not there, for I hardly see how any living thing escaped alive. While I was thrilled to hear and read of the bravery and daring of our men, and I confess I was at times proud of the bravery shown by the Union soldiers, for it is now a common heritage and at this late day we, as Americans, are proud of brave deeds of Americans, no matter whether they wore the blue or the gray. I frankly confess, more often I was sad, for I knew our men were not equipped or as well clothed or fed as were the Union soldiers. We were told by our guide, who seemed to know the history of the battle very well, that there were 85,000 Confederate soldiers and 90,000 Union soldiers engaged in that fierce battle.

I fear I am making this too long to be readable, and yet there is so much about that awful battle one could write almost a week and not tell half the story. I will condense and hasten along. I was anxious to see the "valley of death" that lies between little round knob and Devils Den—I think that is what the guide called it. Anyway, the latter place is a heap of rough and rugged rocks, where many Confederate sharpshooters were stationed, and from which point they picked off the gunners at the Yankee batteries on the knob or hill to such an alarming extent they almost silenced the guns, and it became so serious the general in command of that part of the Union troops had to retaliate by hurriedly calling on General Meade to send him a lot of the best sharpshooters he had, and in this why he was able to offset the horrible work the southern marksmen were doing. They then began to pick off the Confederate sharpshooters, and I saw a cliff in the rocks where 17 Confederate sharpshooters were picked off, one after another. The soldiers of both sides charged over and across the valley of death, back and forth, several times, until on the third day, when the battle was over, thousands of dead men of both armies were piled up, until it was impossible to walk in that valley without stepping upon dead soldiers. The little rivulet, a mere ditch, but a little stream of water, runs down through this valley. It was called the "river of blood." The poor, wounded, bleeding, and dying soldiers of both sides, thirsty and fainty, craving water, tried to drink, but in the opening of the battle the little stream became red like blood, flowing from the veins of brothers grappling in the greatest fratricidal strife history has ever known. They saw their blood flowing down the rivulet and commingling as it went on its way to the sea.

Then we were shown where the Louisiana Tigers, 1,700 of them, charged on the other side of town, trying to take a Yankee battery on the hill. Slocum's field artillery was shifted around on a point of vantage and opened fire upon them down the valley. It swept them like a rain of destruction.

Out of the 1,700 who made the desperate charge and who were fired upon from the flank only about 400 survived. This was on the same day Pickett's men made their charge across an open field. It is impossible to describe just how it looked, but evidently Pickett's men were led into a trap. The guide told us that his father and other Union soldiers told him that Meade's men ceased firing in order to cool their guns and to conserve ammunition, and that evidently Pickett's men thought they were preparing to retreat or were out of ammunition, since they no longer answered Lee's batteries, and then it was that Pickett's division of 4,800 men, then the flower of the southern army, began its charge across the open field, coming out as if on dress parade, many of them carrying their rifles across their necks. When within a few hundred yards of the Union batteries the big guns, as well as the light artillery on the Union side, opened up on them, in the open and mowed them down unmercifully. The objective was a small clump of trees where Meade himself stood. Some of the gallant Confederate soldiers reached the objective. General Armistead scaled the stone wall behind which Meade and his men were fighting and, with his gray cap on his sword, shouted, "Give them the cold steel, boys!" And then he was shot dead, and his lifeless body fell across the tongue of one of the Yankee gun carriages. A few Confederate soldiers also scaled the wall and engaged, hand to hand, in battle, but were captured. When this particular charge was over out of the 4,800 who went into the charge there were only about 400 who survived. Nothing like it on record before. It was not equaled by the charge of the Light Brigade.

We were shown places where hand-to-hand fighting, with fists, clubs, gun butts, and even with rocks, took place. We went to the old spring where men on both sides drank.

There are several thousand monuments erected there to Union soldiers. Some are very handsome. There are at present but two to Confederate soldiers. Georgia ought to have one to its soldiers who fought there. I hope a movement will be started to that end and carried to a conclusion. The Daughters and Sons of the South ought to erect one great master monument there to our men.

It was a trip worth while for me. Everyone who can ought to go and see the battle field at Gettysburg. I came off prouder than ever of my heritage as a son of the South.

HON. THOMAS C. M'RAE

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes to announce the death of a former Member of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, it is with a great degree of sadness that we announce to you the death of a former Member of this House, the Hon. Thomas C. McRae, of Arkansas, who died at Prescott, Ark., on the 3d of this month at the age of 77 years.

Mr. McRae was elected to the Legislature of Arkansas in his early young manhood, at the age of about 26 or 27, and served in the general assembly of that State for more than 20 years. Many of the laws of Arkansas that we have in force to-day were bills introduced by him, which were passed and became the law. After he had served for 20 years in that body he was elected to the Congress in 1885 and served in this body for 18 years, until 1903. After this he was elected in 1920 as Governor of the State of Arkansas, and was reelected to that office in 1922 and served for four years.

He has had an active service in the Congress of the United States and in Arkansas in office for more than 50 years.

I am glad to say for him that there is not a stain either on his private or public record. He was a man who numbered his friends by those who knew him. He was a Democrat of the old type. Many of you, I presume, who are here now have served with him in this body.

I move you, Mr. Speaker, that the Speaker be authorized and directed to send a telegram of condolence to Mrs. Thomas C. McRae at Prescott, Ark., expressing the condolences of this body to her in her sad hour of grief and bereavement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conferees on the part of the House from the Committee on Agriculture may have until midnight to-night to file their conference report in the hope that we may have a vote to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the conferees on the farm bill be given until 12 o'clock to-night to file a conference report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF THE SECOND LIBERTY BOND ACT

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 1648) to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, ask for a conference, and appoint conferees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 1648, with a Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendment, ask for a conference, and appoint conferees. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. HAWLEY, TREADWAY, BACHARACH, GARNER, and COLLIER.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] when he hopes to get the conference in action so as to dispose of this matter?

Mr. HAWLEY. Just as soon as possible. The Senate will have to appoint conferees.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman try to hasten the matter as much as possible?

Mr. HAWLEY. As much as possible; yes.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 6, 1929, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

THURSDAY, June 6, 1929

(Legislative day of Tuesday, June 4, 1929)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will receive a message from the President of the United States.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL

A message from the President of the United States by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that to-day the President had approved and signed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 34) authorizing the Smithsonian Institution to convey suitable acknowledgment to John Gellatly for his offer to the Nation of his art collection, and to include in its estimates of appropriations such sums as may be needful for the preservation and maintenance of the collection.

FLOOD-CONTROL PLANS OF LOUIS WARNER

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from Louis Warner, of Chenoa, Ill., transmitting his general plans, in the form of a brief, to overcome river floods, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Florida, requesting the enactment of legislation to place the uncompleted portions of the Gulf Coast Highway in the Federal 7 per cent system of highways, which, with the accompanying highway map, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. (See memorial printed in full when presented by Mr. FLETCHER on June 5, 1929, page 2370 of the RECORD.)

He also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Florida, which was ordered to lie on the table:

House Concurrent Resolution 23

Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States Congress on April 25 passed a farm relief bill, known as H. R. 1, by a nonpartisan vote of 367 to 34; and

Whereas the bill as it passed the House provided very wise and helpful assistance to the agricultural interests of Florida; and

Whereas we understand that this bill has been substantially amended in the Senate of the United States in ways detrimental to the interests of Florida, and particularly through the insertion therein of the debenture provision, the purpose of which is to increase the cost of those commodities of agriculture consumed by the people of Florida without benefiting in any way the prices of the major commodities raised in the State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Senators from Florida in the United States Senate be requested to support the bill substantially as passed by the House of Representatives, and particularly to vote for the removal of the so-called debenture provision thereof; and

Resolved further, That the secretary of state of Florida be directed to send a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the United States Senators and Members of the House of Representatives from Florida.

Approved by the governor, June 3, 1929.

STATE OF FLORIDA,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, H. Clay Crawford, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of House Concurrent Resolution No. 23, as passed by the Legislature of Florida, session 1929, approved by the governor June 3, 1929, and filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 3d day of June, A. D. 1929.

[SEAL.] H. CLAY CRAWFORD,
Secretary of State.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, memorializing Congress for Federal aid in the construction of a breakwater at or near the city of Trinidad, Calif., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. (See joint resolution printed in full when presented yesterday by the Vice President, page 2368 of the RECORD.)

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, inviting the President of the United States and Mrs. Hoover to attend the California State Fair and Western States Exposition at Sacramento August 31 to September 9, 1929, which was referred to the Committee on the Library. (See joint resolution printed in full when presented yesterday by the Vice President, page 2368 of the RECORD.)

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, protesting against any change in or relocation of surveyed lines affecting in any manner the Klamath River within the State of California, as being an attempt to modify and annul the solemn act of the people of that State in creating the Klamath River fish and game district, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. (See joint resolution printed in full when presented by the Vice President yesterday, pages 2368–2369 of the RECORD.)

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, favoring the passage of farm relief legislation, and including relief to the growers and producers of fruits and vegetables, etc., which was ordered to lie on the table. (See joint resolution printed in full when presented by the Vice President yesterday, page 2369 of the RECORD.)

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, favoring the passage of legislation providing Federal appropriations for the building and maintenance of highways over unappropriated or unreserved public lands and other Federal reservations, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. (See joint resolution printed in full when presented by the Vice President yesterday, page 2369 of the RECORD.)

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, protesting against the continuance of the present unrestricted immigration from the Republic of Mexico, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Immigration. (See joint resolution printed in full when presented by the Vice President yesterday, page 2369 of the RECORD.)

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, favoring the passage of legislation to restrict immigration from the Philippine Islands and to prevent Filipinos from entering the United States who are afflicted with communicable diseases, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration. (See joint resolution printed in full when presented by the Vice President yesterday, pages 2369–2370 of the RECORD.)

WORKING CONDITIONS IN SOUTHERN TEXTILE MILLS

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to file minority views with reference to Senate Resolution 49.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the views of the minority will be received and printed (Rept. 28, pt. 2).

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 1417) for the relief of Dr. S. M. Strong; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 1418) for the relief of M. T. Stark (Inc.);

A bill (S. 1419) for the relief of W. K. Webster & Co.;

A bill (S. 1420) for the relief of Messrs. Stein & Blaine;

A bill (S. 1421) for the relief of Etna Watch Co.;

A bill (S. 1422) for the relief of Epstein Underwear Co.;

A bill (S. 1423) for the relief of Sorenson & Co. (Inc.);

A bill (S. 1424) for the relief of Bengol Trading Co. (Inc.);

A bill (S. 1425) for the relief of Schapiro Bros.; and

A bill (S. 1426) for the relief of B. Lindner & Bro. (Inc.); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 1427) for the relief of C. W. Seitz (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 1428) to provide for the appointment of additional district judges to be known as associate district judges, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 1429) for the relief of Presly Holliday, quartermaster sergeant, Quartermaster Reserve Corps, on the retired list, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 1430) authorizing certain Indian tribes and bands, or any of them, residing in the State of Washington, to present their claims to the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SHORTRIDGE:

A bill (S. 1431) for the relief of Michael Kelly; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 1432) for the relief of E. O. McGillis; and

A bill (S. 1433) authorizing the Secretary of War to award a congressional medal of honor to Henry M. Brinkerhoff; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 1434) granting an increase of pension to Mary Richardson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 1435) granting a pension to Julia A. Payne (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 1436) for the relief of St. Claire Livingston Dodd; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 1437) for the relief of Emil Sauer; and

A bill (S. 1438) for the relief of C. N. Markle; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FRAZIER (by request):

A bill (S. 1439) to provide for final settlement of the claims of J. F. McMurray and J. F. McMurray, as assignee of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish against the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations or Tribes of Indians for legal services rendered and expenses incurred. The first four items in this bill, namely, (1) The J. Hale Sypher case; (2) the Eli Ayers case; (3) Choctaw citizens case, fees and expenses from 1904 to March 4, 1907; and (4) Choctaw-Chickasaw tribal taxes, having been considered by the United States Court of Claims in case No. 33996, but final judgment was not entered, the court holding in these said items it had no jurisdiction, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. ALLEN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 54) to further amend subdivisions (b) and (e) of section 11 of the immigration act of 1924, and creating a joint select committee to study the immigration question; to the Committee on Immigration.

PRINTING OF TARIFF HEARINGS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I submit a concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the concurrent resolution for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 15), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the printing act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Finance be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 1,000 additional copies of the consolidated hearings held before the committee relative to "tariff act of 1929" during the current session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. The resolution provides for 1,000 copies?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator think that is a sufficient number to take care of the needs?

Mr. SMOOT. I think so. In 1922 we had 2,500 copies printed, and we did not distribute them all; so as to those not distributed it was simply a waste of money. I think now we can get along with a thousand copies; but if that number is not sufficient, we shall have some extra copies printed later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

TARIFF COMMISSION REPORTS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator from Utah about the publication of the reports submitted by the Tariff Commission to the President and later submitted to the Senate because of my resolution. The Senator and I have been in conference about the matter, and he will recall that I informed him the Tariff Commission have had no funds with which to print certain reports which they would ordinarily print, and that there are other unprinted reports which would not be made public except for the fact that they were transmitted to the Senate under my resolution. Can not some arrangement be made for the printing of a thousand copies of each of these tariff reports for the use of the Finance Committee and others interested from available committee funds?

Mr. SMOOT. The difficulty about that is to have the contingent fund of the Senate used to pay for a report made by an agency of the Government. The mistake was made by the Tariff Commission in not asking for the amount of money that is necessary for that purpose. The reports have all been printed with the exception of three, as the Senator said, and the commission would like to have those printed. I have been trying to find some way by which we could have them printed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator is mistaken about the number. Will the Senator name for the RECORD, from the memorandum which I gave him, the subject matters on which reports have been made, but which have never been printed for distribution?

Mr. SMOOT. The report on flaxseed, the report on milk and cream, and the report on window glass are the three reports which have not been printed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Those are the reports which have been acted upon by the President, but the Tariff Commission have not funds with which to print them?

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator name the reports which have been transmitted from the Tariff Commission to the Senate which have not been printed and upon which the President did not act?

Mr. SMOOT. There is still one report, a report on halibut, unprinted, in the possession of the Tariff Commission, as well as the three I named. On May 24 a report on cotton hosiery was submitted, but it has not been printed. All the others, I understand, have been printed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator is again in error. Will the Senator name the other reports submitted, please?

Mr. SMOOT. The report on logs of fir, spruce, cedar, or western hemlock; the report on maple sugar and maple sirup; the report on whiting or ground chalk; the report on precipitated chalk; and the report on monumental granite.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Those reports have not been printed and it seems to me the Finance Committee ought to print them. The information should be available in the construction of tariff rates, and it should be available for historic purposes, if for none other. Long and expensive research has been made into those questions, and the valuable information contained in them will be lost unless it is preserved in printed form.

Mr. SMOOT. I think we can get a copy of the reports on more than one of the subjects for the use of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will not the Senator give the matter further consideration within the next day or two and see if there is not some way by which we can have these reports printed?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. If it were not for the mere fact of creating a precedent, I would not hesitate for a moment to ask authority to pay for them out of the contingent fund.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What will happen will be the presentation of a resolution to make these reports a Senate document, and they will be printed in that way, but I think the Finance Committee itself ought to order the printing in separate pamphlets, for then the expense will be less and the number printed will be fewer.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Utah will consider the fact that there are many Members of the Senate who are not on the Finance Committee who would like to secure copies of the reports, and that if the committee prints them a sufficient number should be printed to make them available for the use of all Senators.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only for Senators, but if they are printed we want enough copies so that they may be sent out for general use because of the information they will contain.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I hope the Senator will consider the matter favoraby.

LAW-ENFORCEMENT COMMISSION

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, George W. Wickersham, head of the commission created by Congress when it appropriated $250,000 for the purpose of creating a commission to go into the matter of prohibition, according to press dispatches from New Haven, Conn., proposes that the commission shall hear witnesses and take testimony in closed executive session. At the time the $250,000 was appropriated the matter of prohibition was before the Senate, involving not only the expenditure of the $250,000 to finance the commission but involving at that particular time even a larger sum. The commission therefore is a creature of Congress, and Congress is in a sense responsible for the method of its procedure.

The United States has frequently shown its approval of open covenants openly arrived at, and has declared its opposition to secret treaties. Our Tariff Commission must hold its hearings openly, and the testimony before it is subject to public scrutiny. The Federal Trade Commission conducts its hearings in the open. There is no department of the United States Government to-day which can conduct its business behind closed doors or in secrecy. Personally I am convinced that a large majority of the Senate will at the first opportunity decide in favor of considering presidential nominations in open session and all treaties in open session except where request is made by the President or the State Department for their consideration in executive session.

During the recent campaign there was much discussion of the debatable question of prohibition. Mr. Hoover at that time stated that he would appoint a commission to examine into the subject and to report to Congress. He described prohibition as a "noble experiment." It was a diplomatic designation. All of the extreme drys were pleased with the word "noble." It expressed one thought to them. All of the extreme wets were very much pleased with the word "experiment," which meant an entirely different thing to them. So I hope and I know the country has hopes that when the commission meets it will decide for the American people or for the President what portion of prohibition is noble and what portion of it is an experiment.

The commission also announces that it will conclude its hearings within a period of two years. It is making its program for two years, when the Congress, in the act giving to the commission $250,000, limits the appropriation for the period of 1929–30, a period of one year. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about this being an act of Congress and not a commission appointed by the President of the United States of his own authority, I invite attention to the RECORD of January 22 last, where will be found the original amendment offered to the law by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. It reads as follows:

For the purpose of a thorough inquiry into the problem of prohibition under the provisions of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution and laws enacted in pursuance thereof, $250,000, or as much thereof as may be required, to be expended under the authority and by the direction of the President of the United States.

Later, when the matter came up for final passage, the Senator from Virginia, having first offered it as a substitute for the measure then pending, offered it as an amendment, and it was adopted, and the law to-day reads this way:

For the purpose of a thorough inquiry into the problem of the enforcement of prohibition under the provisions of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution and laws enacted in pursuance thereof, together with the enforcement of other laws, $250,000, or as much thereof as may be required, to be expended under authority and by direction of the President of the United States, who shall report the results of such investigation to Congress, together with his recommendations with respect thereto, said sum to be available for the fiscal years of 1929 and 1930, and for each and every object of expenditure connected with such purposes notwithstanding the provisions of any other act.

Mr. President, the new commission created by Congress is about to meet. The newspapers announce that its first two witnesses will be Mr. Lowman and Mr. Doran, of the Prohibition Unit, and that they are to be heard in closed executive session. If the commission is to impress the country with its findings, it should pursue the adopted policy of all the departments of our Government. It should pursue the policy now being urged upon the nations of the world by our Government for open treaties and publicity. If the commission does not do that, its report will not have the binding effect that it would have if the sessions were open.

In addition to this, the people of the United States should have the right to consider the method of propounding questions and the character of questions submitted to the witnesses. I am not criticizing the commission and the able men who are upon it, but the public should know whether there is a bias, a strong bias for prohibition or against prohibition. They should know by the character of the questions asked and by the character of the witnesses summoned whether this is an impartial fact-finding commission.

I think Senators will agree with me that the appropriation of $250,000 is limited to the year 1929-30, so that the commission can not arbitrarily and in advance determine that it will remain in existence for a period of two years.

I trust, Mr. President, that the newspaper article, which I have in my possession, is incorrect. I hope that the commission will not hold its meetings with closed doors. I hope the report is untrue. In view of the fact that the commission seems to be under the impression that it has a tenure of two years, I should like to impress upon it the thought that it is a creation of Congress and not a creation of the President of the United States.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL BUREAUS FOR PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT (H. DOC. NO. 31)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen	George	La Follette	Smoot
Ashurst	Gillett	McKellar	Steck
Barkley	Glass	McMaster	Steiwer
Bingham	Glenn	McNary	Swanson
Blease	Goff	Metcalf	Thomas, Idaho

Cutting	Howell	Ransdell	Waterman
Dale	Johnson	Reed	Watson
Deneen	Jones	Sackett	Wheeler
Dill	Kean	Sheppard
Fletcher	Keyes	Shortridge
Frazier	King	Smith

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], and will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

In order to secure the utmost expedition in the reorganization and concentration of responsibility in administration of the Federal bureaus connected with prohibition enforcement, so greatly needed to improve their effectiveness, I recommend that the Congress appoint a joint select committee to make an immediate study of these matters and to formulate recommendations for consideration at the next regular session.

I shall be glad to appoint a committee from the departments to cooperate with such a committee of the Congress. The National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement will also cooperate through their studies of the departmental organization.

The subject involves the transfer of parts of various bureaus and agencies from certain departments to others and it includes as well the necessity for the unification and strengthening of our border patrols both in connection with prohibition and illegal entry of aliens. As the question embraces numerous laws and regulations in several bureaus, it will require extensive consideration which, if given jointly by such committees of the Congress and the departments prior to the regular session will save many months of delay.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 6, 1929.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message of the President will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES introduced a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 53) to create a joint congressional committee relating to the reorganization and concentration of the agencies connected with prohibition enforcement, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ACTION OF BRITISH AMBASSADOR AS TO LIQUOR SHIPMENTS

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I desire to take my hat off and bow to the British ambassador. I must congratulate him and his fellow countrymen on his action in saying that he will abide by the Constitution of the United States. I ask to have published in the RECORD an article from this morning's Washington Post, containing a recital of the action of the British ambassador.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Thursday, June 6, 1929]

BRITISH AMBASSADOR WILL REFUSE TO SIGN REQUESTS FOR LIQUOR—EMBASSY LOOMS AS DIPLOMATIC DRY SPOT WHEN SIR ESME INFORMS MEMBERS OF STAFF THAT HENCEFORWARD APPROVAL WILL NOT BE GIVEN FOR SHIPMENTS OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES

The British Embassy loomed as one of the dry spots of the Capital yesterday when it became known that Sir Esme Howard, the British ambassador, had informed members of the embassy staff that from now on he will refuse to sign requests for shipments of alcoholic liquors.

This virtually means that as soon as supplies now on hand in the cellars of British diplomats are exhausted, the British envoy will in fact have fulfilled the promise he made recently in a letter to James T. Carter, prohibitionist, of Lynchburg, Va., that he would surrender the well-recognized diplomatic privilege of importing alcoholic liquors should the United States intimate a desire to cancel the privilege.

In fact, by waiving the diplomatic privilege of his own accord before receiving any intimation, formal or informal, that the Hoover administration desires diplomats to forego their rights of importing wines, he has gone a long step farther than his promise to the Virginia prohibition leader called for.

The ordinary course followed by Washington diplomats when they wish to restock their cellars with choice vintages from their own lands is to inform the State Department that a shipment is expected by such and such a boat arriving, say, in Baltimore on a given day. The State Department in turn informs the Treasury Department, which issues instructions to the customs authorities to pass the shipment on to a representative of the embassy in question, who will come armed with the proper credentials.

The crates, carefully guarded, are then loaded on a truck and, with the diplomat perched atop, are hurried to his chancery in Washington, where distribution is made to the members of the staff, according to the orders they have placed.

The hitch is that the original request to the State Department must be signed by the chief of mission desiring the shipment passed, in the case of the British Embassy, Sir Esme Howard. Should he refuse to make the request, he is perfectly within his rights, it is explained, as much so, for instance, as if he should request the members of his staff to stay away from a certain club—a situation which has frequently arisen in the course of our own diplomatic history, usually as the result of some unpleasantness or slight.

In that event the ruling becomes an issue strictly between the ambassador and the members of his own staff. His subordinates face the alternative of abiding by their chief's decision or requesting a transfer, or, in the case in point, of getting transferred or "going dry."

Elsewhere in the Diplomatic Corps the process of "drying up" the British Embassy is followed with hardly veiled suspicion.

Diplomats deny heatedly that the British ambassador's "dry" view is theirs, in spite of his being dean of the corps. The French ambassador recently authorized the statement that he "differs fundamentally with the view of the British ambassador," and it is said that he has already heard from the Bordeaux wine merchants, who are alarmed at the prospect of losing the trade of Washington's Diplomatic Corps, which amounts on an average to $50,000 annually. Although other chiefs of missions have refrained from expressing their feelings publicly, they do not hesitate to emphasize in private that it would be impossible for them to permit their immunity to be infringed in this manner.

TRIBUTE TO FORMER SENATOR JOSEPH WELDON BAILEY

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a tribute to the late former Senator Joseph Weldon Bailey by Judge Reese Tatum.

There being no objection, the tribute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ORATOR, STATESMAN, AND LAWYER, EX-SENATOR JOSEPH WELDON BAILEY

By Judge Reese Tatum

At the dawn of day, October 3, 1863, in Copiah County, State of Mississippi, a male baby was born and his parents christened him Joseph Edward, afterwards changing his middle name to Weldon. His father and mother were humble people, but very honorable and highly respected. Little perhaps did they dream or anticipate that this infant boy would become one of the great orators, statesmen, debators, lawyers, and intellects of a nation. He held no diploma from any academic college or university. He drank at the legal fountain of Judge Green and Judge Martin, deans of the law department of the Cumberland University of Lebanon, Tenn. He received his degree, bachelor of law, before he reached his majority. He was endowed with an intellect that few possess. He was able to look into the future, observe, analyze, and discern what the effects and results would be. From early manhood he was a profound student of government. He was made a presidential elector at the age of 21. He came to Texas in 1885, selecting Gainesville, Cook County, as his home. When he left Mississippi it was his intention to locate at Helena, Mont., but on his way to Montana he stopped over at Gainesville to visit a friend, and becoming acquainted with the people and being impressed with the country he was persuaded and finally induced by his friends and others to locate at Gainesville. He engaged in the practice of law, first forming a partnership with Judge George Bell, and later with Messrs. Stuart and Harris, the firm name being styled Bailey, Stuart, & Harris. Judge Stuart is now located in Oklahoma City and is regarded as a great lawyer. Judge Harris is a son-in-law of ex-Governor Lowry, of Mississippi. Senator Bailey continued in the practice of his profession up to 1890, at which time he became candidate for Congress in the old fifth congressional district. He made the race against that exalted character and astute statesman, Judge Silas Hare, who had served a number of years in Congress. He defeated Judge Hare for the nomination. He carried every county in the old fifth congressional district with the exception of Grayson County, this county being Judge Hare's home county. At the time Mr. Bailey was elected to Congress he was only 27 years old. Upon presenting himself to take the oath of office a distinguished Member of Congress, who had been a Member of that body for a number of years, asked why the people had elected that young boy over Judge Hare. To this Judge Hare remarked, "Although he is a very young man and has a boyish appearance, you old Members will find him to be the equal of any Member of this Congress before he will have served out his first term." He took his seat in Congress in 1891. He was reelected five consecutive terms, serving his district as a Member of the Lower House of Congress for 10 consecutive years.

At the Democratic State convention held at Galveston in 1898 he made that famous speech against expansion which is so well known. On this question he stood practically alone against a great array of talent and the leading men of this State and of this Union. In 1900 he became a candidate for the nomination of United States Senator, making the race against that clean and dignified statesman, Hon. Horace Chilton, of Tyler, Tex., who was at that time a Member of the Senate. Those days the primaries were not held in the respective counties on the same day as they are now. The result was that Mr. Bailey carried so many of the counties in the State, many of them being around and adjacent to Senator Chilton's home county, Senator Chilton admitted his defeat, withdrew from the race, thereby assuring Mr. Bailey's nomination. Mr. Bailey became the leader of his party in the lower House of Congress at the age of 34. He also became the leader of his party in the United States Senate at the age of 42. He was reelected to the Senate, but resigned on his own volition to engage in the practice of law. He returned to Texas, located at Dallas, forming a partnership with Judge Luther Nickels and Joseph W. Bailey, jr., his son, under the firm name of Bailey, Nickels & Bailey. He was recognized by both political parties as a great orator, a forceful debater and statesman. When it was known that he would address Congress the galleries were filled beyond their capacity. It is said no other Member of either branch of Congress has ever been able to attract the people to the galleries like he did. He possessed a rare trait that so many people are lacking in, i. e., he had the courage of his convictions. He was frank, firm, and outspoken on all occasions and on all public questions, although he was tolerant. At times he was reluctant to take advice from his friends and would not tolerate any dictatorial policy on their part. He feared no foe. He did not pause to feel the pulse of the people and did not stop to ascertain the sentiment of the public before he declared himself on public issues. To say he was a politician would be doing him an injustice. It would be casting an aspersion and stigma on his fair name and character. He was not a politician, but a statesman. He, like Jefferson, Jackson, Calhoun, Benton, Houston, Douglas, Harris, and Lincoln, had many loyal friends and adherents and many bitter enemies. Whether they admired him personally or whether they differed with him on public questions, they recognized his courage and ability. No one has had the audacity to charge him with evading or sidestepping any public question or retreating from any public issue. He did not know what the word "retreat" meant. He was an adherent of State rights. He believed too much power was invested in the Federal Government; that to centralize the power in the Federal Government meant destruction to a republican form of government.

He believed, spoke, and taught the doctrine of Jefferson, Jackson, Calhoun, Hayne, Benton, Douglas, Hill, Vallandigham, Davis, Toombs, Alexander H. Stephen, Houston, Benjamin, and John H. Reagan that all powers not specifically designated in the Federal Constitution were reserved to the respective States and should be retained by them. He opposed plutocracy and despised aristocracy. He was very affable. He was kind in disposition and charming in manner. He was a true friend and was charitable in time of need. Morally his life was above reproach. He was as sedate as Sumner, Hill, or Blaine, but under certain conditions and circumstances he was as sarcastic as Roscoe Conkling, John J. Ingalls, or James A. Reed. For repartee he was the equal of William Pitt or Benjamin Disraeli. To those unfamiliar with the details of the affairs of government he was a cicerone. As an orator he was the equal of Prentiss, Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Benjamin, or Bryan. As a debator he was as logical as Douglas, Webster, Blaine, Hill, or Beck. As a constitutional lawyer he could well be classed with William Pinkney, Horace Binney, John Sergeant, Daniel Webster, Augustus H. Garland, Matthew Carpenter, or Elihu Root. His portrait should and will occupy a conspicuous place in the national gallery of fame, and when the history of this Government is revised the great service that he rendered to the people will be written and recorded therein. In the great debate between Spooner, of Wisconsin, that great constitutional lawyer, and Senator Hale, of Maine, on the affirmative and Senator Bailey on the negative on the bill granting to Federal courts the power to issue mandatory injunctions on a petition without first giving the opposite party the right to be heard Senator Bailey single handed opposed this bill against a great array of talent. After he had concluded his argument against the bill Senator Hale walked over to the Democratic side of the Senate, took Senator Bailey by the hand, and said to him: "Senator, I want to congratulate you; you have thoroughly convinced me that we are wrong and you are right." The bill was defeated. I take leave to mention another instance, when the bill to prohibit rebating by common carriers was introduced in the lower House of Congress, and when it reached the Senate Senator Bailey and Senator Benjamin R. Tillman, of South Carolina, offered an amendment to the bill to include pipe lines. This amendment brought forth a bitter fight in the Senate and was vigorously contested by the big oil interests, but Senator Bailey and Senator Tillman were successful in getting it enacted into law.

After these years of service rendered to the public in national affairs, while in the performance of his duty to his client, on the 13th day of April, at high noon, 1929, while sitting in the district court room at Sherman, Tex., listening to the argument of opposite counsel, the Omnipotent beckoned him to come, calling him away from his professional duties, his clients, the court, the bar, and his friends—he calmly surrendered to the call.

> Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him,
> And lies down to pleasant dreams.

Whether his journey thither was but one step across an imperceptible frontier, or whether an interminable ocean, black, unfluctuating, and voiceless, stretches between these earthly coasts and those of invisible shores, we do not know. Whether at high noon on this April day after death he saw a more glorious sunrise with unimaginable splendor above a celestial horizon, or whether his apathetic and unconscious ashes sleep in cold obstruction and insensible oblivion, we do not know. Whether his strong, subtle energies found instant exercise in another forum, whether his dextrous and disciplined faculties are now contending in a higher tribunal for supremacy, or whether his powers were dissipated and dispersed with his parting breath, we do not know. Whether his passion, ambitions, and affection still sway, attract, and impel; whether he yet remembers his friends and adherents as they remember him, we do not know. These are the unsolved, the insoluble problems of mortal life and human destiny, which prompted the troubled patriarchs to ask that momentous question for which the centuries have given no answer—if a man dies shall he live again?

In his demise the Nation has suffered the loss of a great public servant, the bar a great advocate, the State a noble citizen, society a kind and charming individual and Christian, his family a devoted husband and father, his admirers and the common people a great advocate and loyal friend.

"The hand of the reaper
Takes the ears that are hoary,
But the voice of the weeper
Wails manhood into glory."

With more than a hero's courage, with more than a martyr's fortitude, he welcomed the approach of the invisible hour and passed beyond.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1648) to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended.

AMENDMENT OF SECOND LIBERTY BOND ACT

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1648) to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"(b) All certificates of indebtedness and Treasury bills issued hereunder (after the date upon which this subdivision becomes law) shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation (except estate and inheritance taxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority; and the amount of discount at which Treasury bills are originally sold by the United States shall be considered to be interest within the meaning of this subdivision."

And the Senate agree to the same.

REED SMOOT,
JAMES E. WATSON,
DAVID A. REED,
F. M. SIMMONS,
PAT HARRISON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. C. HAWLEY,
ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
ISAAC BACHARACH,
JNO. N. GARNER,
J. W. COLLIER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will not the Senator explain what was done with the Senate amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate amendment was agreed to, with one amendment, adding the words "or by any local taxing authority," which words were left out inadvertently. The amendment does not change the present law one iota, but those words were left out of the bill by mistake.

Mr. REED. It was a printer's mistake.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it was a printer's mistake.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It does not affect the meaning of the Senate amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. The House yielded to the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

FARM RELIEF—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 17)

Mr. McNARY. I submit the conference report on House bill 1 and ask that it be printed for the use of the Members of the Senate.

There being no objection, the conference report was ordered to be printed, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1) to establish a Federal farm board to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, and to place agriculture on a basis of economic equality with other industries, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"DECLARATION OF POLICY

"SECTION 1. (a) That it is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, so that the industry of agriculture will be placed on a basis of economic equality with other industries, and to that end to protect, control, and stabilize the currents of interstate and foreign commerce in the marketing of agricultural commodities and their food products—

"(1) by minimizing speculation.

"(2) by preventing inefficient and wasteful methods of distribution.

"(3) by encouraging the organization of producers into effective associations or corporations under their own control for greater unity of effort in marketing and by promoting the establishment and financing of a farm marketing system of producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperative associations and other agencies.

"(4) by aiding in preventing and controlling surpluses in any agricultural commodity, through orderly production and distribution, so as to maintain advantageous domestic markets and prevent such surpluses from causing undue and excessive fluctuations or depressions in prices for the commodity.

"(b) There shall be considered as a surplus for the purposes of this act any seasonal or year's total surplus, produced in the United States and either local or national in extent, that is in excess of the requirements for the orderly distribution of the agricultural commodity or is in excess of the domestic requirements for such commodity.

"(c) The Federal farm board shall execute the powers vested in it by this act only in such manner as will, in the judgment of the board, aid to the fullest practicable extent in carrying out the policy above declared.

"FEDERAL FARM BOARD

"SEC. 2. A Federal farm board is hereby created, which shall consist of eight members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and of the Secretary of Agriculture ex officio. In making the appointments the President shall give due consideration to having the major agricultural commodities produced in the United States fairly represented upon the board. The terms of office of the appointed members of the board first taking office after the date of the approval of this act shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of nomination, two at the end of the first year, two at the end of the second year, one at the end of the third year, one at the end of the fourth year, one at the end of the fifth year, and one at the end of the sixth year after such date. A successor to an appointed member of the board shall have a term of office expiring six years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy in the board occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, shall be appointed for the remainder of such term. One of the appointed members shall be designated by the President as chairman of the board and shall be the principal executive officer thereof. The board shall select a vice chairman, who shall act as chairman in case of the absence or disability of the chairman. The board may function notwithstanding vacancies, and a majority of the appointed members in office shall constitute a quorum. Each appointed member shall be a citizen of the United States and shall not actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as a member of the board; nor shall any appointed member during his term of office engage in the business (except such business as is necessary to the operation of his own farm or farms) of buying and selling, or otherwise be financially interested in, any agricultural commodity or product thereof. Each appointed member shall receive a salary of $12,000 a year, together with necessary traveling and subsistence expenses, or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law, while away from his official station upon official business.

"ADVISORY COMMODITY COMMITTEES

"SEC. 3. (a) The board is authorized to designate, from time to time, as an agricultural commodity for the purposes of this act (1) any regional or market classification or type of any agricultural commodity which is so different in use or marketing methods from other such classifications or types of the commodity as to require, in the judgment of the board, treatment as a separate commodity under this act; or (2) any two or more agricultural commodities which are so closely related in use or marketing methods as to require, in the judgment of the board, joint treatment as a single commodity under this act.

"(b) The board shall invite the cooperative associations handling any agricultural commodity to establish an advisory commodity committee to consist of seven members, of whom at least two shall be experienced handlers or processors of the commodity, to represent such commodity before the board in matters relating to the commodity. Members of each advisory committee shall be selected by the cooperative associations from time to time in such manner as the board shall prescribe. No salary shall be paid to committee members, but the board shall pay each a per diem compensation not exceeding $20 for attending committee meetings called by the board and for time devoted to other business of the committee authorized by the board, and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses, or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law for civilian employees in the executive branch of the Government. Each advisory committee shall be designated by the name of the commodity it represents, as, for example, the 'cotton advisory committee.'

"(c) Each advisory committee shall meet as soon as practicable after its selection, at a time and place designated by the board. Each advisory committee shall meet thereafter at least twice a year upon call of the board, and may meet at other times upon call of a majority of the members thereof. Each advisory committee shall select a chairman and secretary.

"(d) Each advisory committee may by itself or through its officers, (1) confer directly with the board, call for information from it, or make oral or written representations to it, concerning matters within the jurisdiction of the board and relating to the agricultural commodity, and (2) cooperate with the board in advising the producers through their organizations or otherwise in the development of suitable programs of planting or breeding in order to secure the maximum benefits under this act consistent with the policy declared in section 1.

"GENERAL POWERS OF BOARD

"SEC. 4. The board—

"(1) shall maintain its principal office in the District of Columbia, and such other offices in the United States as in its judgment are necessary.

"(2) shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

"(3) shall make an annual report to Congress upon the administration of this act and any other matter relating to the better effectuation of the policy declared in section 1, including recommendations for legislation.

"(4) may make such regulations as are necessary to execute the functions vested in it by this act.

"(5) may appoint and fix the salaries of a secretary and such experts, and, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended, and subject to the provisions of the civil service laws, such other officers and employees, as are necessary to execute such functions.

"(6) may make such expenditures (including expenditures for rent and personal services at the seat of government and elsewhere, for law books, periodicals, and books of reference, and for printing and binding) as are necessary to execute such functions. Expenditures by the board shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the board.

"(7) shall meet at the call of the chairman, the Secretary of Agriculture, or a majority of its members.

"SPECIAL POWERS OF BOARD

"SEC. 5. The board is authorized and directed—

"(1) to promote education in the principles and practices of cooperative marketing of agricultural commodities and food products thereof.

"(2) to encourage the organization, improvement in methods, and development of effective cooperative associations.

"(3) to keep advised from any available sources and make reports as to crop prices, experiences, prospects, supply, and demand, at home and abroad.

"(4)to investigate conditions of overproduction of agricultural commodities and advise as to the prevention of such overproduction.

"(5) to make investigations and reports and publish the same, including investigations and reports upon the following: Land utilization for agricultural purposes; reduction of the acreage of unprofitable marginal lands in cultivation; methods of expanding markets at home and abroad for agricultural commodities and food products thereof; methods of developing by-products of and new uses for agricultural commodities; and transportation conditions and their effect upon the marketing of agricultural commodities.

"REVOLVING FUND

"SEC. 6. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $500,000,000 which shall be made available by the Congress as soon as practicable after the approval of this act and shall constitute a revolving fund to be administered by the board as provided in this act.

"LOANS TO COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS

"SEC. 7. (a) Upon application by any cooperative association the board is authorized to make loans to it from the revolving fund to assist in—

"(1) the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities and food products thereof;

"(2) the construction or acquisition by purchase or lease of physical marketing facilities for preparing, handling, storing, processing, or merchandising agricultural commodities or their food products;

"(3) the formation of clearing house associations;

"(4) extending membership of the cooperative association applying for the loan by educating the producers of the commodity handled by the association in the advantages of cooperative marketing of that commodity; and

"(5) enabling the cooperative association applying for the loan to advance to its members a greater share of the market price of the commodity delivered to the association than is practicable under other credit facilities.

"(b) No loan shall be made to any cooperative association unless, in the judgment of the board, the loan is in furtherance of the policy declared in section 1 and the cooperative association applying for the loan has an organization and management, and business policies, of such character as to insure the reasonable safety of the loan and the furtherance of such policy.

"(c) Loans for the construction or acquisition by purchase or lease of physical facilities shall be subject to the following limitations:

"(1) No such loan for the construction or purchase of such facilities shall be made in an amount in excess of 80 per cent of the value of the facilities to be constructed or purchased.

"(2) No loan for the purchase or lease of such facilities shall be made unless the board finds that the purchase price or rent to be paid is reasonable.

"(3) No loan for the construction, purchase, or lease of such facilities shall be made unless the board finds that there are not available suitable existing facilities that will furnish their services to the cooperative association at reasonable rates; and in addition to the preceding limitation, no loan for the construction of facilities shall be made unless the board finds that suitable existing facilities are not available for purchase or lease at a reasonable price or rent.

"(d) Loans for the construction or purchase of physical facilities, together with interest on the loans, shall be repaid upon an amortization plan over a period not in excess of 20 years.

"MISCELLANEOUS LOAN PROVISIONS

"SEC. 8. (a) Loans to any cooperative association or stabilization corporation and advances for insurance purposes shall bear interest at a rate of interest per annum equal to the lowest rate of yield (to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per cent) of any Government obligation bearing a date of issue subsequent to April 6, 1917 (except postal-savings bonds), and outstanding at the time the loan agreement is entered into or the advance is made by the board, as certified by the Secretary of the Treasury to the board upon its request: Provided, That in no case shall the rate exceed 4 per cent per annum on the unpaid principal.

"(b) Payments of principal or interest upon any such loan or advance shall be covered into the revolving fund.

"(c) Loans to any cooperative association or stabilization corporation shall be made upon the terms specified in this act and upon such other terms not inconsistent therewith and upon such security as the board deems necessary.

"(d) No loan or insurance agreement shall be made by the board if in its judgment the agreement is likely to increase unduly the production of any agricultural commodity of which there is commonly produced a surplus in excess of the annual marketing requirements.

"STABILIZATION CORPORATIONS

"SEC. 9. (a) The board may, upon application of the advisory commodity committee for any commodity, recognize as a stabilization corporation for the commodity any corporation if—

"(1) the board finds that the marketing situation with respect to the agricultural commodity requires or may require the establishment of a stabilization corporation in order effectively to carry out the policy declared in section 1; and

"(2) the board finds that the corporation is duly organized under the laws of a State or Territory; and

"(3) the board finds that all the outstanding voting stock or membership interests in the corporation are and may be owned only by cooperative associations handling the commodity; and

"(4) the corporation agrees with the board to adopt such by-laws as the board may from time to time require, which by-laws, among other matters, shall permit cooperative associations not stockholders or members of the corporation to become stockholders or members therein upon equitable terms.

"(b) Any stabilization corporation for an agricultural commodity (1) may act as a marketing agency for its stockholders or members in preparing, handling, storing, processing, and merchandising for their account any quantity of the agricultural commodity or its food products, and (2) for the purpose of controlling any surplus in the commodity in furtherance of the policy declared in section 1, may prepare, purchase, handle, store, process, and merchandise, otherwise than for the account of its stockholders or members, any quantity of the agricultural commodity or its food products, whether or not such commodity or products are acquired from its stockholders or members.

"(c) Upon request of the advisory committee for any commodity the board is authorized to make loans from the revolving fund to the stabilization corporation for the commodity for working capital to enable the corporation to act as a marketing agency for its stockholders or members as hereinbefore provided. Not less than 75 per cent of all profits derived by a stabilization corporation each year from its operations as such a marketing agency shall be paid into a merchandising reserve fund to be established by the corporation. No such payment shall be required whenever the fund is in such amount as, in the judgment of the board, constitutes a sufficient reserve for such operations of the corporation. Out of the remainder of such profits for the year the corporation shall repay any outstanding loan made under this subdivision and the accrued interest thereon, or if all such loans and accrued interest have been fully repaid, then it may distribute a patronage dividend to its stockholders or members. Such patronage dividend shall be paid to each stockholder or member on the basis of the total volume of the commodity or its products for the year marketed for his account through the corporation.

"(d) Upon request of the advisory committee for any commodity the board is authorized to make loans from the revolving fund to the stabilization corporation for the commodity to enable the corporation to control any surplus in the commodity as hereinbefore provided and for meeting carrying and handling charges and other operating expenses in connection therewith. The board shall require a stabilization corporation to establish and maintain adequate reserves from its profits from its surplus control operations before it shall pay any dividends out of such profits. All losses of the corporation from such operations shall be paid from such reserves, or if such reserves are inadequate, then such losses shall be paid by the board as a loan from the revolving fund. Any amounts so loaned for payment of losses shall be repaid into the revolving fund by the corporation from future profits from its surplus control operations. Any stabilization corporation receiving loans under this subdivision for surplus control operations shall exert every reasonable effort to avoid losses and to secure profits, but shall not withhold any commodity from the domestic market if the prices have become unduly enhanced, resulting in distress to domestic consumers. Stockholders or members of the corporation shall not be subject to assessment for any losses incurred in surplus control operations of the corporation.

"(e) A stabilization corporation shall keep such accounts, records, and memoranda, and make such reports with respect to its transactions, business methods, and financial condition, as the board may from time to time prescribe; shall permit the board to audit its accounts annually and at such other times as the board deems advisable; and shall permit the board, upon its own initiative or upon written request of any stockholder or member, to investigate the financial condition and business methods of the corporation.

"(f) No loan shall be made to any stabilization corporation unless, in the judgment of the board, the loan is in furtherance of the policy declared in section 1.

"CLEARING HOUSE ASSOCIATIONS

"SEC. 10. Upon application of any cooperative association handling an agricultural commodity or of producers of an agricultural commodity, the board is authorized, if it deems such association or producers representative of the commodity, to assist in forming producer-controlled clearing house associations adapted to effecting the economic distribution of the agricultural commodity among the various markets and to minimizing waste and loss in the marketing of the commodity, if such assistance, in the judgment of the board, will be in furtherance of the policy declared in section 1. The board may provide for the registration, and for the termination of the registration, of any clearing house association in accordance with such regulations as the board may prescribe. Such clearing house associations are authorized to operate under rules adopted by the member cooperative associations and approved by the board. Independent dealers in, and handlers, distributors, and processors of, the commodity, as well as cooperative associations handling the commodity, shall be eligible for membership in the clearing house association: Provided, That the policy of such clearing house association shall be approved by a committee of producers which, in the opinion of the board, is representative of the commodity. Clearing house associations shall utilize the market news service and other facilities of the Department of Agriculture as far as possible.

"PRICE INSURANCE

"SEC. 11. The board is authorized, upon application of cooperative associations, to enter into agreements, subject to the conditions hereinafter specified, for the insurance of the cooperative associations against loss through price decline in the agricultural commodity handled by the associations and produced by the members thereof. Such agreements shall be entered into only if, in the judgment of the board, (1) coverage is not available from private agencies at reasonable rates, (2) the insurance will be in furtherance of the policy declared in section 1, (3) the agricultural commodity is regularly bought and sold in the markets in sufficient volume to establish a recognized basic price for the market grades of the commodity, and (4) there is available with respect to the commodity such market information as will afford an accurate record of prevailing prices for the commodity covering a period of years of sufficient length to serve as a basis to calculate the risk and fix the premium for the insurance. The agreements shall require payment of premiums so fixed and shall include such other terms as, in the judgment of the board, are necessary. The board may make advances from the revolving fund to meet obligations under any insurance agreement, but such advances together with the interest thereon shall, as soon as practicable, be repaid from the proceeds of insurance premiums.

"ADMINISTRATIVE APPROPRIATION

"SEC. 12. For expenditures in executing the functions vested in the board by this act (including salaries and expenses of members, officers, and employees of the board and per diem compensation and expenses of the commodity committees), incurred prior to July 1, 1930, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $1,500,000. No part of the moneys appropriated in pursuance of this authorization shall be available for expenditures, including loans and advances, for the payment of which the revolving fund or insurance moneys are authorized to be used.

"AVOIDANCE OF DUPLICATION

"SEC. 13. (a) The board shall, in cooperation with any governmental establishment in the executive branch of the Government, including any field service thereof at home or abroad, avail itself of the services and facilities thereof in order to avoid preventable expense or duplication of effort.

"(b) The President may by Executive order direct any such governmental establishment to furnish the board such information and data as such governmental establishment may have pertaining to the functions of the board; except that the President shall not direct that the board be furnished with any information or data supplied by any person in confidence to any governmental establishment in pursuance of any provision of law or of any agreement with a governmental establishment.

"(c) The board may cooperate with any State or Territory, or department, agency, or political subdivision thereof, or with any person.

"(d) The board shall, through the Secretary of Agriculture, indicate to the appropriate bureau or division of the Department of Agriculture any special problem on which a research is needed to aid in carrying out the provisions of this act.

"(e) The President is authorized, by Executive order, to transfer to or retransfer from the jurisdiction and control of the board the whole or any part of (1) any office, bureau, service, division, commission, or board in the executive branch of the Government engaged in scientific or extension work, or the furnishing of services, with respect to the marketing of agricultural commodities; (2) its functions pertaining to such work or service; and (3) the records, property, including office equipment, personnel, and unexpended balances of appropriation, pertaining to such work or services.

"EXAMINATION OF BOOKS AND ACCOUNTS OF BOARD

"SEC. 14. Vouchers approved by the chairman of the board for expenditures from the revolving fund pursuant to any loan or advance or from insurance moneys pursuant to any insurance agreement, shall be final and conclusive upon all officers of the Government; except that all financial transactions of the board shall, subject to the above limitations, be examined by the General Accounting Office at such times and in such manner as the Comptroller General of the United States may by regulation prescribe. Such examination, with respect to expenditures from the revolving fund pursuant to any loan or advance or from insurance moneys pursuant to any insurance agreement, shall be for the sole purpose of making a report to the Congress and to the board of expenditures and of loan and insurance agreements in violation of law, together with such recommendations thereon as the Comptroller General deems advisable.

"MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

"SEC. 15. (a) As used in this act, the term 'cooperative association' means any association qualified under the act entitled 'An act to authorize the association of producers of agricultural products,' approved February 18, 1922. Whenever in the judgment of the board the producers of any agricultural commodity are not organized into cooperative associations so extensively as to render such cooperative associations representative of the commodity, then the privileges, assistance, and authority available under this act to cooperative associations shall also be available to other associations and corporations producer owned and producer controlled and organized for and actually engaged in the marketing of the agricultural commodity. No such association or corporation shall be held to be producer owned and producer controlled unless owned and controlled by cooperative associations as above defined and/or by individuals engaged as original producers of the agricultural commodity.

"(b) It shall be unlawful for any member, officer, or employee of the board to speculate, directly or indirectly, in any agricultural commodity or product thereof, or in contracts relating thereto, or in the stock or membership interests of any association or corporation engaged in handling, processing, or disposing of any such commodity or product. Any person violating this subdivision shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

"(c) It shall be unlawful (1) for any cooperative association, stabilization corporation, clearing house association, or commodity committee, or (2) for any director, officer, employee, or member or person acting on behalf of any such association, corporation, or committee to which or to whom information has been imparted in confidence by the board, to disclose such information in violation of any regulation of the board. Any such association, corporation, or committee, or director, officer, employee, or member thereof, violating this subdivision shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"(d) The inclusion in any governmental report, bulletin, or other such publication hereafter issued or published of any prediction with respect to cotton prices is hereby prohibited. Any officer or employee of the United States who authorizes or is responsible for the inclusion in any such report, bulletin, or other publication of any such prediction, or who knowingly causes the issuance or publication of any such report, bulletin, or other publication containing any such prediction, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $500 or more than $5,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both: Provided, That this subdivision shall not apply to the members of the board when engaged in the performance of their duties herein provided.

"(e) If any provision of this act is declared unconstitutional, or the applicability thereof to any person, circumstance, commodity, or class of transactions with respect to any commodity is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and the applicability of such provision to other persons, circumstances, commodities, and classes of transactions shall not be affected thereby.

"(f) This act may be cited as the 'Agricultural marketing act.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us when he expects to call up the conference report?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, under the rule the conference report must lie over one day in the House. It will be submitted to the House to-morrow, and it is thought by the House conferees that action can be taken by 2 or 3 o'clock in the afternoon. I may state that it is my desire to call it up as soon as it is transmitted to the Senate.

Mr. REED. That is, some time to-morrow?

Mr. MCNARY. Yes; to-morrow; provided it meets with the pleasure and I have the consent of Members of the Senate.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF THE IMMIGRATION ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 37) submitted by Mr. NYE April 23, 1929, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 151) to repeal the national-origins provisions of the immigration act of 1924.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I mean to speak as briefly as I may upon the resolution which is pending as the unfinished business.

The question of immigration has agitated the Congress for more than 20 years. Back in 1913 Congress passed a bill to restrict immigration. It was vetoed by President Taft. Later it passed a bill to restrict immigration and imposed the literacy test. That bill likewise was vetoed by President Wilson. Only the outcome of the World War impressed upon the Executive as well as Congress the thought that it was vitally necessary for the welfare of America that the unlimited inflow of aliens from every country must be stopped if American prosperity and American standards of living were to be maintained. So in 1921 the first such law was enacted. It limited temporarily immigration into the United States to 3 per cent of the number of foreign-born persons reported at the last census, the census of 1910. It gave quotas which bore no resemblance to the make-up of the United States as it then stood. It was wholly unsatisfactory, and not only those who were concerned with the quality of immigration which we were getting but those who were concerned with the quantity of immigration we were getting sought the enactment of a permanent law.

In 1924 such a bill was introduced in each House and was debated at great length. In the Senate it was the unfinished business for more than six weeks and was constantly under debate during that time. It was the impression of nine-tenths of the Senators and, as I recall, nine-tenths of the Members of the House of Representatives—I think that was substantially the vote—that immigration must be more sternly limited and that, so far as possible, each year's immigration ought to bear the same proportion as to nationality as the population of the United States already here.

The enactment of that law in 1924 was hailed with approval by every student of biology and of population problems, by every patriotic organization and every labor association, and it was regarded by many people as America's second Declaration of Independence. If throughout the future that law can be kept impartial so that we may say to every man who challenges it, "We have restricted immigration for the national good, but we have done it impartially, according to the statement of the Declaration of Independence that all men are created equal," then its permanency is more assured than if great groups of people can come and say that the stock from which they sprang is discriminated against in this law of the Congress. That is the reason why this question seems to me to be important.

I am attracted by the fact that the national-origins basis will reduce the aggregate of immigration by about 11,000 persons below the number admitted on the 1890 census basis. It pleases me and others who think as I do that the annual inflow is throttled down just that much more; that under the national-origins scheme we will get only 153,000 as a maximum, instead of 164,000 under the 1890 census basis. But much more important than that seems to me to be the element of impartiality, which will serve as an armor for the protection of that law through the decades to come, when it is bound to be challenged as the pressure for admission to the United States increases; and I think it is bound to increase from year to year.

Mr. President, in all that I have ever said—and I am afraid I have said a great deal—on the subject of immigration, I have tried to begin with the statement that in dealing with a subject like this we must consider all men equal.

When we remember that the architecture of the world still pays its tribute to the genius of Greece, and that the sculpture of the world has never known anything so fine as that which came from Greece, we can not speak slightingly of the Greek race.

When we remember that brush never touched canvas with such genius as in Italy, we can not speak slightingly of that nation, whose art so far surpasses our own.

When we remember that the great music of the world comes from Germany, no man in America has a right to speak slightingly of them.

When we remember that the literature that marks the world's high point in human thought was written in the tongue which we jointly own with the British, we have no reason to speak slightingly of that race.

Let us, in considering this question, not get into the morass of national antipathies, and undertake to say that the Dane is better than the Swede, or the German is better than the Briton, or the Italian is better than the Greek, or make any other such contrast which can only lead us into a maze of contradictions and disagreements; but let us consider the subject as if these nationalities were all, in some way, desirable stocks.

If we are going to divide our annual inflow of immigrants according merely to the foreign-born of some particular census, it means an unending fight to adopt some other census than the one that at the moment is the basis. That is not a prophecy on my part. Mr. Smith began his campaign last year with the statement that he thought it was wholly unfair to resort to a census 38 years old, meaning 1890, and implying and stating in subsequent conversations that he would like to base it on the census of 1920. If Senators have time to regard the chart that hangs by the door, they will see just what that would do to the annual immigration of the United States, giving Poland more than Great Britain, giving us an annual inflow of immigration that would bear no resemblance whatsoever to the population that lives here to-day. And yet we are going to have that strife, we are going to have that bid for the votes of alien blocs, indefinitely unless we can establish some basis upon which we must rest for all time, saying, "This is impartial, and you have to admit it." Then, when we have done that, we may regard the question as settled.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NYE. Just for the sake of clarity, does the Senator know of any Member of this body who is urging the 1920 census as a basis for immigration?

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; I do not. I can imagine, however, that many Senators will follow the example of Governor Smith in time to come if this be an open question.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am curious to know where the Senator got his information that Governor Smith ever said that he wanted to base the quota on the 1920 census.

Mr. REED. I read in one of his very first statements—I do not remember whether it was his acceptance speech or not—that he resented basing the quotas on a census 38 years old.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know that; but I refer to the other part of the statement. I do remember that the Republicans made a campaign on the ground that they were going to stand for national origins, and that Smith wanted to flood the country, and that Mr. Hoover was opposed to it; and the first thing Mr. Hoover did was to send in a recommendation to abandon national origins.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I did not mean to get into a political discussion; but before I get through I want to talk about the atittude of both of the candidates for the Presidency.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think when the Senator has talked about his own candidate he will find that he will have a day or two of talk.

Mr. REED. I shall not forget to mention my own candidate, Mr. President; but I am not ready to do it yet.

The resolution which is pending before the Senate is a resolution to discharge the Committee on Immigration from a repealer bill now lying in that committee. It is an unusual procedure in the Senate, Mr. President. I have had the precedents looked up, and I find that not since 1924—five years ago to-day, June 6, 1924—was a similar effort made, except by unanimous consent where a bill had been wrongly referred and the committee was discharged merely to transfer the bill to another committee. But, against resistance, I find no effort to follow such a course as is attempted now since June 6, 1924, at which time an effort was made by Mr. La Follette, then Senator from Wisconsin, to discharge the Committee on Foreign Relations from a resolution for the relief of German women and children; and the motion failed by a vote of 23 to 53.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Is there not another unusual matter in connection with this? Is it not customary also to have a poll of the committee taken, so that the absentees may express their views?

Mr. REED. Sometimes.

Mr. COPELAND. In this particular instance I happened to be absent from the city when the vote was taken, and I had no opportunity in the committee to express the view I held in regard to the matter.

Mr. REED. The committee, Mr. President, held extensive hearings in February of this year. It heard all the witnesses that presented themselves against national origins, and it heard a good many who were in favor of national origins; but it did not have time enough to hear all of the proponents of the national-origins scheme.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just a moment. After extended hearings, the committee voted 7 to 4, last February, to maintain the national-origins scheme, and to postpone indefinitely the bill for its repeal.

In the present Congress, when this resolution was introduced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], the committee again held a meeting to consider it; and at that time, by a vote of 4 to 2—there were only 7 members present—the vote was 4 in favor of national origins, 2 against it, and 1 not voting.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. COPELAND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. I yield first to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. In order that I may get a clear understanding—I am asking purely for information, I will say—did the Senator look up the records, while he was looking up the precedents, in order to ascertain how often a committee had refused to act where there was a perceptible and reasonable demand on the part of Members of the Senate that they should take some action either one way or the other?

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; I did not look that up. We have all known it in our experience.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not the custom almost universally that where even one Member, particularly the introducer of a bill or a resolution, asks the committee to act, even though it may be adversely, the committee takes either one horn or the other of the dilemma in order to put the bill before the Senate?

Mr. REED. I do not think so, Mr. President. My observation has been that adverse reports were used by the committees almost exclusively in cases where bills were clearly unworthy, and it was desired to report them out and have them indefinitely postponed.

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps I have not the right understanding. Did the committee take adverse action?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes. The committee voted in each case, in February and in April, indefinitely to postpone these resolutions. A vote was taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Something was said about the political side of the matter, and I wish to call attention to the provisions of the two platforms of 1928.

Mr. REED. Will not the Senator indulge me in that? I have the Republican platform here, and I meant to come to it later, but I want first to explain the subject. A good many of the Senators now here have never heard a full discussion of this plan of immigration, and I should like them first to understand what it is all about.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, I think they might look to their own platforms as the guiding star. Both platforms absolutely provide for the present restrictive immigration laws, except modifications as to family ties.

Mr. REED. Absolutely.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the only exception in the Democratic platform and that is the only exception in the Republican platform.

Mr. REED. And both candidates forgot the platforms, shut their eyes to what their parties had done, and went off wooing strange gods.

Mr. McKELLAR. At all events, whatever the candidates may have done, it seems to me it is our duty to stand by the platforms of our respective parties and keep the restrictive laws as they are, with the exception purely of family ties, which are not in issue in this particular matter.

Mr. REED. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to refer again to the vote in the committee. Frankly, I felt very much chagrined that I was not present and not recorded, because, as the Senator knows, I have been in opposition to the national-origins plan. There are 12 members of the Committee on Immigration, and the figures shown by the Senator indicate that 6 voted.

Mr. REED. And one was present and not voting.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; but my thought is that if the entire committee had been polled it is possible that the verdict might have been different. I speak of this merely because the Senator has called attention to the fact that it is unusual that an effort should be made to discharge a committee; but, likewise, I think it is unusual that so small a vote in the committee should have determined the final action.

Mr. REED. The committee had changed in only one case, I think, since the previous Congress; and in that Congress, just two months before, the vote was 7 to 4 against a change in the law; and it was a natural assumption that the Senators regarded the matter as settled.

Mr. COPELAND. Yet, after all, this is a new Congress; and my own thought is—I do not want to be disagreeable about it—that there should have been a more representative number present when the final action was taken. Of course, however, I am not finding any fault with the Senator.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I had nothing to do with the calling of the meeting or with the bringing up of the resolution at that time, and I could simply vote my belief, as it turned out.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Pursuing my line of inquiry further, the Senator informs us that the committee actually took a vote on the matter.

Mr. REED. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. The majority was against it. The thing that I do not understand—and I have asked several Senators about it, and they have given me no information—is why after that vote was there not an adverse report made and the matter put on the calendar of the Senate?

Mr. REED. Because the vote was indefinitely to postpone the resolution in the committee—a very common practice.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. May I go on a little while without interruption?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will not the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator has called attention to the votes in the committee on the resolution when it was under consideration last. I am the ranking Democratic member of the Committee on Immigration. I had another committee meeting that morning, and after completing my work upon the other committee I hastened to the room of the Committee on Immigration, anticipating that the committee would be in session for some little time. I arrived there just as the committee had recessed or adjourned and the action was taken as indicated by the Senator.

I have had no opportunity to indicate that had I been at the committee meeting I should have voted against the position taken by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. I was in favor of suspending the operation of the national-origins provision of the law, or further investigation, or if that were not possible I should have been willing to vote for a repeal of it in order that a more just allocation of the quota may be made. I am not in favor of raising the limit at all. I am entirely satisfied with 150,000 or 162,000 or 163,000, as now provided, but I think there should be a different allocation. The only thing that would have induced me to vote for a suspension of the measure for another year before it goes into operation or for its repeal would have been a desire to see those injustices in the national origins law cured.

I rose, with the consent of the Senator, merely to state that if I had been at the committee meeting I should have voted in favor of the resolution.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me now go back, if I may, for a moment without interruption, to the question of the quota distribution. When the emergency law of 1921 was passed, which, by its terms, was to endure for only a year, and was extended by subsequent resolution so that it finally lasted three years, there were available about two weeks for the calculation of some kind of numerical distribution of the total.

It was suggested, I think, by the Commissioner of Immigration at that time, that one method that could be used was to take the statistics of foreign-born persons in the 1910 census, the latest census that had then been published, and to split up the number arbitrarily according to that list of foreign born. There was not any other method available at that moment. Nobody has since then been able to suggest an alternative method, other than this national-origins scheme.

The committees and the two Houses of Congress accepted the suggestion unhesitatingly; they took the 1910 census, which had these figures of foreign born in it, and they said, "We will let in a number equal to 3 per cent of the foreign-born people here in 1910."

The 1910 census, of course, was made on a basis of pre-war geography. There was not time, in the space of two weeks, to calculate the distribution of those figures according to postwar geography, and with all these new countries that had emerged from the peace conference, with all of the countries which had lost territory in the war, and those that had gained, it was almost a wild guess, based on the number of square miles of territory switched, as to how they would divide up those quotas. It can readily be seen that nothing else but a guess based on square miles of territory acquired would do for Yugoslavia, or Czechoslovakia, or Estonia, or Lithuania, or Finland, or any of the new countries.

That was not satisfactory, as I have said. The quotas were all lopsided. So, when the 1924 bill came along the suggestion was made by Professor Garis, of Vanderbilt University, that a much better way, and the way to get an immigration that was much more like the American population, was to go back to the 1890 census, which was a point about midway between what was called the old immigration and the new, when the tide set in from southern Europe.

Professor Garis suggested that instead of basing the quotas on 1910 or 1920, the latter of which was then available, we should go back to 1890, and that is what Congress decided to do, thinking that the figures were quite readily available. I will show in a few minutes, Mr. President, how utterly unreliable were the figures then presented to the Congress for the 1890 basis. But that idea was accepted as a temporary expedient, and the Congress then, in 1924, after days of debate, after a great amount of discussion pro and con, adopted the national-origins plan as the permanent scheme which, being impartial, should endure for the future, as soon as the figures could be calculated.

I had the honor of introducing the national-origins amendment, and in my exuberance of hope I thought that two years would be enough to make the calculation; and in the amendment as introduced I allowed only two years to make the calculation of the quotas under national origins. It was suggested very wisely by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that the time be extended to three years, and that the date be made 1927, so as to give them another year to do the calculating.

In practice we found that it took five years, because it is not a matter of basing it merely on the 1790 census, as so many people think, but it has required a study of county histories, of county records, of statistics of emigration, which fortunately are preserved in many of the countries of Europe, particularly in continental Europe, where there are careful records of emigration and destination of emigration going back for a couple of centuries.

All that had to be consulted, and the quota board, made up of the best scientists we have in the Bureau of the Census, the Department of Commerce, and the State Department, have worked steadily for five years, and that was the real reason for the postponements of 1927 and 1928. It was only this year when the chairman of the quota board, the Assistant Director of the Census, Doctor Hill, came before us and said, "Our work is finished. No further extension will enable us to improve on the work. We have gone through all the sources of information, and we are ready now to say that our figures are final." When he said that, the committee said, "Then postponements shall stop."

That is why the law has not been changed, by approval of the committee, and that is why the President has made his proclamation of the national-origins quotas, and that is why they will go into effect on the first day of next month.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NYE. Does the Senator mean to say that because the experts have declared that their figures are final, the President has issued his proclamation?

Mr. REED. The President has issued it because the law requires him to.

Mr. NYE. Not because the experts said that was the last word?

Mr. REED. Not at all; I did not mean to imply that.

It is noticeable, I think, in the very able discussion made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] during the two days that he spoke, that he confined himself entirely to a condemnation of the national-origins quotas, and he has not at any time undertaken to defend the 1890 basis. He has spoken of the inaccuracy in the national-origins calculations, and admittedly in any statistics that deal with 120,000,000 people there will be inaccuracies.

There are inaccuracies in every census, there are inaccuracies in every election, there are inaccuracies in any statistical work that deals with a population so vast as this. He has not called attention, however, to the glaring inaccuracies which characterized the 1890 basis and which exceed manyfold any possible inaccuracy in the alternative method. It is those to which for a moment I would like to call the attention of the Senate.

Let me first say a word about the quota board and refer to the membership of that board. The chairman is Dr. Joseph Hill, the Assistant Director of the Census, many, many years a Government employee, one of the foremost statisticians of the United States, a man as impartial as the multiplication table or the calendar, utterly without bias one way or the other in this matter. This is what was said of him last month by the Assistant Secretary of State, who came before us to give the attitude of the State Department. He said:

> Doctor Hill, of the Department of Commerce, has been chairman of the committee that has worked on that matter—
> Meaning the quotas—
> and I think all of us are prepared to say that we have absolute confidence in him and his colleagues and are prepared to take their statement as to the accuracy of their conclusions and the sufficiency of the information upon which those conclusions are reached.

Mr. President, I want next to call the attention of the Senate to the statement by Mr. Boggs, the geographer of the State Department, who is another member of the quota board. I read from page 8 of the hearings before the Committee on Immigration on February 4 last:

> Q. To sum it all up, which, in your judgment, involves the greater uncertainty, the greater possibility of error, the national origins as now determined or 1890?
>
> Mr. BOGGS. Without having carefully recomputed—using the latest material we have—the present quotas, I could simply give my impression——
>
> Q. That is what we want.
> Mr. BOGGS (continuing). And that is that the national-origins quotas as they have been computed, or as they will be slightly revised in the final report, are, taken as a whole, at least as accurate as the present quotas. Many of the quotas are more accurate.

Then turning back to the statement of Doctor Hill, the greatest authority on the subject, which we find on page 11 of the hearings of the committee on March 15, 1928, I call attention to this:

> Q. If the question be raised of the element of uncertainty due to changes in political boundaries in Europe, it is true, is it not, that the element of uncertainty pertains as much to the 1890 basis as to the national origins?
>
> Doctor HILL. Quite true.
> Q. There is a necessary factor of guesswork there?
>
> Doctor HILL. Or of estimates; yes.
> Q. In the effort to determine what portion of German immigration, let us say, came from German Poland?
>
> Doctor HILL. Yes. I think there is perhaps a somewhat erroneous impression about that. Most people, I believe, have the idea that the 1890 basis rests upon exact figures, but that is rather far from being the case, because the 1890 census does not show how many people there were in the United States in 1890 who were born in that portion of Europe which is now Czechoslovakia. That had to be estimated. It does not show how many people there were in the United States in 1890 who were born in that portion of Europe which is now Yugoslavia; that had to be estimated. It does not show how many people there were from that portion of Europe which constitutes the present Germany or the present France or the present Irish Free State; although that had to be estimated. The law contemplates that. It provides that where there have been transfers of territory, the number of people born in the transferred territory shall be estimated. So there is a pretty large element of estimates in the 1890 basis.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NYE. The Senator has, during the course of his remarks, spoken of the inaccuracy in the 1890 basis and has just recently quoted Mr. Boggs as an authority. I find in that same testimony from which he is quoting Mr. Boggs being asked by Senator REED:

> Now, Mr. Boggs, turning to the 1890 method—that is, the basis of determining the quotas according to the foreign born, shown by the census of 1890—is that certain, definite, and accurate?
> Mr. BOGGS. I take it that the figures as reported are accurate. We have no reason to question them.

Mr. REED. Since that testimony was delivered I have learned that the State Department has made even a further recalculation of the 1890 basis, and that the figures that would be in use next year are different from those which are being used this year; but that will come later.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was wondering if the Senator was going to put into the RECORD not only the table which is now on the wall but the amount of immigration from 1890 to 1900, from 1900 to 1910, from 1910 to 1920, and from 1920 up to the present, so that at some place we might see either by actual figures or by estimates what the present composition of the population of the United States is at this time?

Mr. REED. Yes; I expect to do that, but in passing I might call attention to the fact that it is rather misleading to stop the chart at the point at which the chart now on the wall of the Senate Chamber stops. For example, the immigration from Germany which is shown there as 1,450,000 in the decade ending in 1890, dropped in the following decade to 505,000 and went on dropping until in one decade it got down to 143,000. I shall call attention to that later.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator's table show as nearly as it is possible the national derivation of the present population of the United States?

Mr. REED. Yes; as determined by the quota board.

Now I will finish with the statement of Doctor Boggs. As I said before, he is recognized by authorities on both sides of this matter as the greatest statistician in dealing with population problems now alive in the United States. On page 17 of the testimony of March 15, 1928, I find this:

> Question. I would like to ask Doctor Hill, who is a census expert, what, in his opinion, is the fairest way to all of the nationalities involved of calculating the distribution of the aggregate quota of immigration that Congress sees fit to admit.
> Doctor HILL. I am not sure that my qualifications as a census expert or a statistician make my judgment on that question of more value than other peoples. I will say, however, that no proposition has been brought to my attention that seems to me fairer than this one of national origin. There seems, indeed, to me to be a rather marked absence of alternative proposals, except the 1890 basis; that is about the only alternative I have had brought to my attention as against the national-origins plan.

Now, let me call attention to just what happened to the 1890 basis since Congress was willing to put it in effect as a temporary expedient. In the debates in the House it seemed as if almost every Member of the House had to make a speech on the subject, and most of them put into the RECORD a calculation of the quotas that had been obtained from the Census Bureau under the 1890 basis. The same table occurred about twenty-five times in the debates in the house. It was used in the House report, Report No. 350 of that same session, and it was used here in the Senate. This is what we were told when we based the law on the Census Bureau's estimates was going to be the effect of it. Mention is made about the uncertainty and inaccuracy of the 1890 basis, and that the President would have difficulty if he thought the 1890 basis is an accurate basis and not open to the variations of national origins.

We were told by the Census Bureau in 1924 that, for example, the quota for Czechoslovakia would be 1,873 persons, but when in the following year they put the 1890 basis in effect they had almost doubled that number and made the quota 3,073. We were told when we passed the law that under the 1890 basis Germany would get 45,129 and Great Britain would get 41,672, substantially the same to the two countries; but when they came to put into effect the absolutely certain 1890 basis, they boosted the German quota to 51,227 and reduced the British quota to 34,007. The German quota was raised over 6,000 and reduced the British quota over 7,500.

Then we were told in 1924 that using the 1890 basis the Irish Free State quota would be 20,786. When they came to put it into effect they raised that without explanation to 28,567. Italy, it was represented to us, would have 4,589 and that was reduced to 3,845. We were told that Poland would be 8,872, and that was reduced without explanation to 5,982. Russia, they said, would be 1,792, and when the figures came out in the proclamation we found they had raised the Russian quota under the 1890 basis to 2,248—and then Senators talk about the inaccuracy of national origins.

I have taken the sum of the variations between the official census estimate in 1924 for the 1890 basis and Mr. Trevor's wholly unofficial estimate of the division of the population on the basis of national origins, with the following result: National origins as finally proclaimed after five years of expert study are within 7.3 of conforming with the estimates we had in 1924, whereas the 1890 quotas in effect until the end of this month are 9.8 per cent inaccurate as compared with the Census Bureau estimates of 1924—and then it is said that there is inaccuracy in national origins.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is it not true that this is largely a fight on restricted immigration that is being conducted, masquerading as an attempt to modify the immigration law?

Mr. REED. That is why I have it so much at heart. I think this is the first attack; it is the first breach in the wall of restricted immigration. If we once get away from a basis admittedly impartial into the realm of controversy that surrounds the selection of our future population, we will be in endless difficulty.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was wondering if the table about which I was speaking a few moments ago, which the Senator says he will put in the RECORD, will take into consideration the fact that Poland, Czechoslovakia, and a few other countries have only been created since the treaty of Versailles, and whether or not an allowance would be made, for example, in the population of Germany and Hungary and Austria of the number that came in prior to the creation of those two countries, so that at least a proportion of the so-called Hungarian population would be reflected in Czechoslovakia.

Mr. REED. Yes; that is just what the quota board has been studying. Let me illustrate just how that will work.

Mr. TYDINGS. In other words, the Senator's table will show the complexion of the United States as of its present-day population, notwithstanding the fact that some of those countries which have contributed to that population are only 10 years old?

Mr. REED. Precisely; though our present-day population, we must understand, is the 1920 basis, which is the latest census on which we could work.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. I apologize for projecting myself into the debate and do not desire to engage in any controversy with my able friend from Pennsylvania nor my dear friend from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. But the statement was just made, as I understood it, that this was an effort to secure larger immigration to the United States and that we were masquerading under an attempt merely to modify the law. As I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania, he assented to that view.

I want to say to the Senator, though I am the ranking Democratic member upon the committee and perhaps hundreds of persons have spoken to me in regard to the measure, that not a single one from any part of the United States has asked me to support any measure increasing the number of those coming to the United States. The only opposition that has been expressed to me by many who have visited me has been with respect to the allocation of the number which we now are admitting into the United States.

I will say further that where there have been 10 who have spoken to me in favor of modifying the national-origins scheme there have been 100 or more of those proponents of the national origins who have spoken with a vehemence and fanaticism that scarcely is to be appreciated, it is so intolerant. I was amazed that there should be so much venom and intolerance manifested by those who have been back of the proposition for which the Senator is contending.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I hope I have not shown venom. I will admit that I have taken this question most seriously for myself and I think the various patriotic societies have also done so. I believe that there is nothing before us that compares in importance with the proper solution of this question. I remember—I think I have told the story before——

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. REED. I shall yield to the Senator in a moment.

When this law was passed the late Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Lodge, rose from his seat and, as he passed by the front row where I was sitting he said to me, "Young man, that is the most important act of the American Congress in the 31 years I have been in it, with only the possible exception of the declaration of war against Germany." I feel that way about this question, and if I am vehement, as the Senator has said the patriotic societies are vehement, I make no apology, because my earnestness comes from that sincere belief. Now I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. I did not rise to comment upon the earnestness of the Senator from Pennsylvania, because I am entirely in accord with him as to the tremendous importance of the subject which he is discussing, and I concede his right to be earnest with respect to it; but, as I understood, a moment ago the Senator made some reference to the attitude of the President. He said that the President asserted that the 1890 census as to the foreign-born population was an accurate basis. I am wondering upon what authority the Senator makes that statement with regard to the attitude of the President? Before the Senator answers, I wish to remind him that we all know the President criticized the national-origins provision of the law and suggested in effect that it was unworkable. I had not known, however, that he had declared himself for the 1890 census as a basis for immigration, and I had not known that he had made a statement concerning the accuracy of that basis. I should be glad, indeed, if the Senator from Pennsylvania could tell me on what he bases his statement.

Mr. REED. It is a necessary implication from the President's statement that under the national-origins clause it is impossible to calculate the quotas accurately and without hardship, and his later statement that he believes in retaining the present features of the law. He made that statement in his acceptance speech, and he said nothing more about it until after the election.

Mr. STEIWER. If I may make a further observation, I think I very distinctly recall that later in the campaign the President went so far as to say that as between the 1920 census and the 1890 census he preferred the 1920 census. That was after something else had been said by some one in the campaign; but it seems to me it could hardly be said because the President criticized one method that he meant to commit himself to another. I have been told—I have no right to quote the President in the matter—that, perhaps, the President desires to study the question and that possibly neither of these plans is the one which he wants Congress to consider as the final solution of this great question.

Mr. REED. Then it was an unfortunate misunderstanding that I derived from the President's statement in his acceptance speech that the basis now in effect carries out an essential principle of the law. However, we need not quarrel about that. What we have to determine is not whether Mr. Hoover is right or wrong but what our position is going to be on this most important of all questions.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the junior Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I am anxious to hear the Senator's further discussion of the question of the accuracy of the figures of origins. The Senator made a statement a moment ago which suggested to me that he regarded the national-origins method as essential for the preservation of America, and he quoted a statement made by the late Senator Lodge. Has the Senator from Pennsylvania considered this aspect of the case? Under the national-origins plan it is proposed to divide the population of America into groups, beginning with the very formation of our Government—the Anglo-American group, the German-American group, the Italio-American group, and so forth—in order to ascertain the basis of the quotas of nationalities entitled to admission. Does not that very separation of our people into groups revive, may I say, Old World consciousness in all of us? Does it not belie the very thought of an America, with a definite culture of its own, and rather divide us up into groups transplanted from the Old World and still surviving?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York has ever read the declaration of the oath-bound association which is known as the Steuben Society, I do not think he will believe race consciousness needs much revival. It is already entirely too lively. I am coming to that a little bit later. Any system or distribution of immigration inevitably means a distribution among nations. So long as we are going to permit any immigration from abroad, or are going to apportion it among nations, the opportunity is afforded of invoking foreign national consciousness. That is a great misfortune, and some of the people who advocate the total restriction and prohibition of all immigration have that argument to support their claim.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to discuss further the matter of inaccuracy. Let me first tell just what the national-origins idea is. I have been asked by some Senators to describe it. In substance it is this: We take the entire population of the United States, native born, foreign born, American citizens, and unnaturalized aliens, every human being living in continental United States, according to the census of 1920, with the single exception of those whose ancestors came here in involuntary servitude. We take the white population according to the latest available census.

I might say, parenthetically, that our negro citizens accept that gladly; they have no desire that they should be counted in or that there should be any quota given to the regions from which their ancestors came. There has been no dispute about that. Taking the whole white population according to the latest census, not discriminating against aliens, not discriminating against foreign born, but treating all alike, we give it to the quota board as their task to discover the national origins—not the racial origins, but the national origins—of the entire white population; and in the law we tell them that, of course, they must not do the absurd thing of undertaking to run back the genealogy of the 105,000,000, or whatever the number may be, of white inhabitants. That is manifestly impossible. Instead of that, we say they shall start with all of the historical and statistical data available and bring it down from the past to the present, and in that way do as they have already done, determine definitely the composition of our present Nation. I say "as they have already done." They made a study of a century of population growth back in 1910, and it was published as an official document by the Census Bureau. As a result of that study in cold blood, before any immigration issue had arisen, they divided the population then in the United States according to its national origins at that time. The study which they devoted to that problem then was relatively small compared to the study they have devoted to it since that time. They did not then go abroad and dig up all the emigration statistics from foreign countries, and they did not run down all of the county histories which are extant in the United States; they did not then go to the directories in the old towns and do all of the research work which they have done since; but they had gone far enough to show that it was not an absurd thing that we are asking them to do. So we gave them their task, and when they approached it they found that the problem divided itself into four parts. I think it might interest the Senate to describe what they were. They took the census of 1920, and found right off that there was one element of population which had been born abroad and which had emigrated to this country, and it was a very considerable number of millions of people. The birthplaces of those people were stated in terms of postwar geography. They knew the exact location of the farms from which they came; they knew whether they were in Poland or Russia or Germany. So, as I have said, they could give their birthplaces in terms of modern geography, and they are so reported. As to that group the inquiry was finished. It required no calculation, no geographical knowledge, no estimate of any kind.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. As to that particular group, was not the problem identical with that of calculating the quotas on the 1890 census basis?

Mr. REED. No; because the 1890 census basis is all in prewar geography. One-sixth of the area of Europe has changed sovereignty since 1890, and all that had to be estimated. I will come to that in a moment. There are only three countries in the entire list—Sweden, Norway, and Switzerland—whose quotas are 2 per cent of the figure of foreign born shown from those respective countries in the 1890 census. Every other quota under the 1890 basis requires some estimate as to change of territory under the treaty of Versailles or the accompanying peace treaties with other countries.

Mr. STEIWER. But in considering national origins and confining ourselves for the moment to the particular group which the Senator is discussing, if a foreigner included in that group who came to this country prior to the war still resides in America, how can he be classified with respect to postwar geography.

Mr. REED. Because he was asked, "What country do you come from?" He replied, "I came from Austria." "What town in Austria did you come from?" The very place of his birth was determined, and if that town in Austria has by operation of the peace treaty been ceded to Poland or to Czechoslovakia, he is assigned to Poland or Czechoslovakia, as the case may be. It is all in terms of postwar geography.

Mr. STEIWER. I appreciate that; but is there any difference between that case and the case of some foreign-born individual who had been enumerated in the 1890 census. Is not the place of his origin as readily ascertained?

Mr. REED. Of course, in the 1890 census he appears as a citizen native of Austria. We can not go back and find that man who in 1890 said, "I was born in Austria," and we can not get him to say in what town he was born.

Mr. STEIWER. Is that information to be found anywhere in the records of the Government?

Mr. REED. Not at all. It would be necessary to take the whole census over again and to ascertain the facts as to those who were then here, and that would be a manifest impossibility. Consequently, they had to estimate what proportion of the people who in 1890 stated they were born in Austria were not in fact born in postwar Austria. That is where the element of estimate comes in, and that is where all the variations to which I have called attention have arisen.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. NYE. But the Senator has told us earlier in the day that there were very complete records of emigration existing in the European countries, which would certainly determine and make available to us the information we should want as to the sections or the parts of each country from which that immigration came.

Mr. REED. It is entirely likely that it would be possible to check up the 1890 figures further and make further changes in them by applying to them a study of the emigration from those countries that have preserved their county and parish records. One example is Croatia, a Province which used to be Hungarian, and is now part of Yugoslavia. They have kept rather remarkably complete records of emigration from that Province; but that has never been done, nobody has ever attempted to apply that to the reading of the 1890 census. In any event, it would be only partially complete.

However, let me go on.

I have shown how group No. 1 of our population in 1920 has its national origin definitely fixed in a way that requires no estimate, no study, no analysis.

Group No. 2 consists of children of foreign-born parents—that is, those native Americans who had one or both parents born out of this country—and in that group the place of birth, for obvious reasons, had to be stated in pre-war geography. Very many of the children of foreign-born parents could not specify the exact point of birth of their parents; so that group, the so-called children class, had to be treated in exactly the same way that the 1890 census had to be treated, with a measure of estimate in dividing the whole countries up into postwar geographical terms. It required a lot of research to do that; and let me explain an instance that will illustrate better than a general statement could.

In Germany, as you see there, there was a considerable emigration to America back before 1850. The fact was, I am told, that most of that emigration went from southwestern Germany, from Saxony. At one time there was scarcely a house there that did not have a representative in America. Then about the middle of the century that flow of emigration seemed to dry up, and in its turn came a great outpouring of persons from a district that had not been represented before at all, and that was up in East Prussia, around the neighborhood of Posen and Konigsberg; and from that source this desire to migrate seemed to spread like an epidemic. The extreme northeastern corner of Germany began to send its throngs over here. Since the World War the extreme northeastern corner of Germany has suffered territorial disasters in the making of the Polish corridor and in ways like that. The extreme east of Germany, what used to be called Polish Germany, has all been lopped off. The changes on the western frontier of Germany are familiar to all of us, and there had to be calculations made of all that, and it was necessary to understand those varying trends and sources of immigration in order to apportion it intelligently; and the degree to which that controlled the figures is shown in the wild aberration of these census estimates in 1924 under the 1890 basis. To that extent that factor of uncertainty which pervades all of the 1890 basis applies to this second group, the children class of the 1920 population that we are considering.

Then there was the third class. That was what was called the postcolonial. They have been hard put to it to invent labels for these groups; but they have united in calling this third group either the grandchildren class or the postcolonial immigrants. There we were dealing with much smaller figures. Fortunately, that is so, because as we go back toward the early years of the nineteenth century the records are less definite, and an error in them is of less importance, because the numbers are small.

Take these, for example: In the decade between 1820 and 1830, 7,700 persons came from Germany. A difference of 600 people in the 1920 census makes a difference of only 1 person in the quota. So you can see that if this quota board had been so inaccurate as wholly to ignore the existence of that 7,700—and I assure you that they did not—nevertheless the difference in the final quota would be microscopically small when we are dealing with a quota of 30,000 or 25,000 persons. Those errors, as in all statistical work, counterbalance one another; and the statisticians are very confident, and have told us so, that the margin of error in their calculation in that group is infinitesimal.

That brings us, then, to the fourth group, about which so much controversy has raged—what is called the colonial group. It is a surprising thing to know how little immigration we got into this continent in the first three centuries after Columbus came. I have been told that less than 80,000 immigrants came here in all the centuries down to 1750. It is criticized that perhaps a German came on a British ship. It is not enough to know the nationality of the ships that came; but when we think back to it and remember how few persons came on any one ship, and how those voyages were organized in a sense as local enterprises, we can be reasonably sure that there, too, any possible errors have pretty well balanced themselves in the calculation of the origin of those people.

The first census we ever took was made in 1790, seven years after peace with Great Britain; and, as we look back at it now, while it did not get all the information that it might have, it got the names of the heads of all the families, and those names, many of them, were very significant in telling the national origin of the person who was listed. If you found a man named Schneider, it could be reasonably assumed that he came from somewhere in western Germany. If you found a man of my name, it is a fair assumption that he came from somewhere in Great Britain, either directly or by way of North Ireland. There was not very much difficulty in most of them. But the Council of Learned Societies of America had been studying that matter for a long time, and there had been many analyses made of the 1790 census; and we had the benefit in the quota board of two scientists who were specially detailed by the Council of Learned Societies to help the quota board in its study of this analysis of the 1790 population.

I do not remember whether I said that that census comprised families totaling 3,000,000 people. There were not 3,000,000 names in the 1790 census by any means; but the families of those who were named comprised that many persons.

Doctor Hill was asked how the accuracy of the 1790 census compared with our more modern censuses; and, rather to my surprise, he replied that he believed that it was at least as accurate, and he explained that by saying that it was made at leisure. It was not endeavored to be gathered up all within a couple of weeks, as we make it now. It was not a great national spasm, trying to catch everybody in a very few days, and pin them down like butterflies on a board, and in that way get the population. The 1790 census took months to make, and it was made with a stable population that did not travel around so much, and it was made by neighbors who already probably could have answered a good many of the questions for themselves. The enumerators knew the people whom they were counting in a way that is impossible to-day; and so Doctor Hill expresses it as his opinion that that census probably was quite as accurate as the census of 1930 will be, or the census of 1920 was.

Then in the study of this colonial population a great storm has been raised about the muster rolls; and I dare say every Senator has heard that the findings of the quota board can not be reconciled with the muster rolls of the Continental Army. I want to explain that for a moment.

We all remember the way the war went between 1776 and 1783. Men went into the service for a few weeks, and then went back to complete their farm work. Men were called out to a sudden alarm when an attack was expected at a particular place and, the alarm disappearing, they went back to their homes; and the same individual who made a short enlistment and reenlistment, staying in the Army all the time, would appear over and over again. At the end of each short enlistment his name would occur afresh.

Now, experience shows us that when a country is in a major war, if 10 per cent of the population is in the military service, it has given about all of its man power. In the World War we had less than 5 per cent of our population in the military service. Hardly any country has ever been known to have more than 10 per cent in the service; and yet if you contrast the number of names on the muster rolls with the population of the country at that time it would indicate that every male, from babies in arms to men of 95, was in the Army, and 20 per cent of the women besides.

Take the State of Massachusetts, for example, where it is claimed that there were 24 Caseys mentioned in the muster rolls and only 6 Caseys in the 1790 census. The fact was——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, how were those muster rolls obtained? What are those muster rolls? What is the historical connection of them?

Mr. REED. The muster rolls have been printed. They are a compilation of the muster rolls of all of the regiments of the Revolutionary Army.

Mr. SWANSON. How were they obtained?

Mr. REED. They have always been preserved. They were kept here in the War Office for a long time after the war, and then Congress directed them to be printed; and they are printed in full detail, so that it is possible to tell the name of every man who was in every company of every regiment in the war; and, of course, the pay rolls were based on them.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, is that document available for distribution?

Mr. REED. It is available for distribution; but I should advise the Senator to take a truck if he is going to attempt to distribute it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Could I get any number of copies of it?

Mr. REED. Yes; but it is an enormous compilation. Let me illustrate.

In the State of Massachusetts alone, whose population at that time was 307,000 persons, men, women, children, and little babies—307,000 persons—the muster rolls show 161,800 names.

Mr. CARAWAY. And that notwithstanding the fact that there were a great many people who were out of sympathy with the cause?

Mr. REED. Disregarding all the Tories and all the people who were sick in bed and all the girl babies, the fact remains that every male aged from 1 day to a hundred years must have been in the Army, if their argument is right, and about 20 per cent of the women.

In those days men's names were spelled strangely. There were lots of people named Cassidy in the Army. People of that name seem to get into armies. But Mr. Cassidy's name was spelled in 24 different ways, with one "s" or with the vowels in different places, and if it is argued that every one of those Cassidys was a different human being we would get the preposterous result that as one Cassidy got out of Company A of such and such a regiment another Cassidy was there on the same date to take his place. It must have been the same man. Yet the variation in names is obvious. When we contrast the totals, as in Massachusetts, we get inevitably to the conclusion that those muster rolls give no reliable information either of the total population or of its ancestry.

Now, just a word about that. Here on the wall the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] has put a chart which shows an immigration from Ireland in the decade beginning in 1820 of 54,000 persons, and in the next decade of 207,000, and in the decade which ended in 1850 of 780,000. We all know there were lots of so-called Scotch-Irish who were not Irish at all, who came from King James colony there in Ulster, back in the previous century. They are all ascribed to Ireland. But every mother's son of them came from North Ireland, from that part of Ireland which ought, in fairness, to be included in the British quota, which of course belongs to England, Wales, Scotland, Northern Ireland, and all of the Dominions. That is the quota ascribed to Great Britain, and every one of those persons ought to be reflected in that quota, and not in the quota of the Irish Free State.

If I am asked for my authority on that, I quote the same authority that was quoted by the Senator from North Dakota at the beginning of his own argument here this week, Mr. Madison Grant, one of our greatest American students of population matters. He said, speaking of that Irish immigration which on this chart is ascribed to the Irish Free State:

> The Scotch-Irish, who were numerous on the frontier of the middle colonies, were of course of pure Scotch and English blood, although they had resided in Ireland for two or three generations. They were quite free from admixture with the earlier Irish, from whom they were cut off socially by bitter religious antagonism, and they are not to be considered as "Irish" in any sense.
> There was no important immigration of other elements until the middle of the nineteenth century, when Irish Catholic and German immigrants appear for the first time upon the scene.

So, as it is with Germany, we have to be careful of the use of the word "Irish" in discussing the subject.

Mind you, in all this I imply no discrimination, no preference for one group of Irish over the other, and lest there be misunderstanding, I do not mean to imply any preference for the religion of the one over the other. I am trying not to discriminate. I am trying merely to state the facts as they were.

Now, I want briefly to call attention to some more of the reasons why the 1890 quota list has been so shockingly inaccurate. As I said a while ago, there are only three countries in the whole quota list—Sweden, Norway, and Switzerland—only three countries in the entire list, whose quotas under the 1890 basis are 2 per cent of the figures appearing in that census. There were some countries—and Spain is a good example of them—whose boundaries were not changed, but whose colonies had to be taken into consideration in fixing these quotas, because of the number of people we had had migrating here from Spanish colonies, for example, and nothing of that sort is shown in the 1890 census, and it all had to be guessed at. That goes to explain why even the Spanish figures estimated by the census in 1924 were wide of the mark.

When we get to central Europe, the countries affected by the war, we discover, to our amazement, that 66 per cent of all of the immigration now coming into the United States comes from countries whose boundaries were changed by the war in such fashion as to make it an element of guess as to what they should get under the 1890 quotas. Sixty-six per cent of the 1890 list is guesswork. Nobody has yet said that that was true of national origins.

The result of that has been, as I tried to explain a while ago, that when we take the Census Bureau's estimates of 1924 and compare them with the 1920 quotas, we find that the additions or the subtractions—taking it either way one pleases—amount to 9.8 of the total. The variations of to-day's list from that precise estimate which they thought they were giving us five years ago show errors aggregating 9.8 per cent, while the very unofficial estimates produced by Mr. Trevor at that time—of course, there could be no official estimates—have been shown to be just 7.3 per cent wrong on national origins. When we talk about inaccuracy it is well to remember those comparative figures.

Mr. President, I do not intend to fall into the same error I have tried to point out in the Senator from North Dakota. I am not going to try to defend my side wholly by attacks on the other side.

Let us compare the quotas given here with the claims that were made by these same nationalities before this question became acute. I want to turn, first, to the claims made by the Irish as to the proportion which their element constitutes in the population of the United States.

Probably the best study of the Irish citizenship of the United States made up to the present time was made by Rev. Gerald Shaughnessy, who was formerly professor of theology in the Marist College here in Washington. He wrote a book called "Has the Immigrant Kept Faith? A Study of Immigration and Catholic Growth in the United States, 1790–1920." This book was published in 1925 under the sanction of the Archbishop of Baltimore. It is studious, thoughtful, and well worth reading.

Doctor Shaughnessy estimates that about 35,000 persons in the population of 1790 were members of the Catholic Church. He goes on to estimate the number of Irish, and says:

> In sad contrast with the latter figures stands the estimated number of Catholics actually present in the United States at the end of the War of Independence, 35,000 or about one-fourth the number of Irish Catholics alone who should have been enumerated at the time. If the Irish element among the American Catholics of that day be estimated at 25,000, there appears to have been a loss to the church of 125,000 among the Irish immigrants to this country previous to 1790.

He also says:

> Accordingly, in view of the facts adduced in the first chapter, it may be estimated that of the above-mentioned 550,000—

That is, the number he had given earlier in his book for the aggregate of the Irish population in the United States at that time—

> About 400,000 were of Protestant stock—

Meaning the Ulstermen, from Northern Ireland—

> While probably between 100,000 and 150,000 were of Catholic origin or descent.

I am giving only brief extracts, but it comes down to this: That he, the most thorough student of Irish migration to the United States, fixes the number as between 100,000 and 150,000.

The actual number apportioned by the quota board to Ireland at that time is 140,000. Testing them by their own representations, the quota board has given them much more than the average they claim.

With the Germans it is even clearer. In 1909 the Houghton Mifflin Co. published a book called "The German Element in the United States," by Prof. Albert Bernhardt Faust, of Cornell, a recognized scholar, a recognized historian on this subject. He estimates the number of Germans in the United States in 1775 as 225,000. Then he carries that on down to 1790 and makes two different estimates, by two different methods, one of them 345,000, one of them 375,000, and he adopts what he calls a mean of 350,000—that is, persons not of German birth but of German blood. And, mind you, that includes a large number of people born in Poland, a large number born in Austria—we all know the predominant stock in Austria is German—a very large number born in Alsace and Lorraine, and in Bohemia, in Russia, in Switzerland, in Holland, in Belgium, and in Luxemburg, and he fixes the total number at 350,000.

If every one of those persons, including all those born in the low countries and in Luxemburg and Poland and Russia and all the others, were added to the national-origins stock, if every one of them was assumed to be born in modern Germany of to-day, it would operate to increase the German quota only 2,800 persons over the present German quota given under national origins.

What possible justification can they have, when that is their claim, in demanding a quota of 51,000 persons, when their own claims would justify only twenty-seven thousand and odd, providing every person of German blood who was born in Austria and Belgium and Russia and Holland and Luxemburg was counted in as a native of postwar Germany of 1924? When we test them by their own figures, we can readily see how closely the quota board has come to what they demand.

Under the 1890 basis, to-day 31 per cent of all the immigration into the United States comes from Germany. By their own figures they have never claimed over 17 per cent of the white population of continental United States.

Senators and others talk about inaccuracy. Could anything be more inaccurate than to give Germany, who claims 17 per cent and probably has between 16 and 17 per cent, 31 per cent of the immigration into this land? The obvious unfairness of it, the obvious partiality, the indefensible partiality of it seems to me to be only too apparent. How could we ever maintain a system of restricted immigration open to attack as that is open to attack by anyone of any other nationality?

I have no complaint to make of the Germans. We are at peace with them. The immigrant stock that we get from Germany is an admirable stock. I have no war to fight with Germany on this question. The people who have come to America from there have made law-abiding citizens on the whole. But just because that is true is no reason for giving them so much more than their proportion in our national population would justify.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if there are more applicants now from Germany than their quota under the 1890 basis?

Mr. REED. Yes. I have the figures and I want to give them both as to Germany and England. I am sorry to talk so long, but it is impossible to condense it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will give the figures. I would like to have them.

Mr. KEYES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KEYES. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen	George	La Follette	Smoot
Ashurst	Gillett	McKellar	Steck
Barkley	Glass	McMaster	Steiwer
Bingham	Glenn	McNary	Swanson
Blease	Goff	Metcalf	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Goldsborough	Moses	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Greene	Norbeck	Townsend
Brookhart	Hale	Norris	Trammell
Broussard	Harris	Nye	Tydings
Burton	Harrison	Oddie	Tyson
Capper	Hatfield	Overman	Vandenberg
Caraway	Hawes	Patterson	Wagner
Connally	Hayden	Phipps	Walcott
Copeland	Hebert	Pine	Walsh, Mass.

Cutting	Howell	Ransdell	Waterman
Dale	Johnson	Reed	Watson
Deneen	Jones	Sackett	Wheeler
Dill	Kean	Sheppard
Fletcher	Keyes	Shortridge
Frazier	King	Smith

Mr. BURTON. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a good deal has been said about the quality of the immigration we are getting now and which we will get under the enlarged quotas. A good deal has been said about the fact that various nations are not using the quotas that they get now. For example, I have heard the argument made many times, "What is the use of enlarging the British quota? They do not use what they have." Upon making some inquiry as to the facts I have definite information from the State Department which reveals rather a peculiar situation.

Every nation in Europe is now and has been in the past using its quota to the last unit in the issuance of visas, but in every nation, due to illness perhaps, to deaths, to inability to raise passage money, the actual number of arrivals is less than the aggregate number of quota visas that have been issued. That is true of Great Britain, it is true of Germany, and it is true of every other country on the list, so that what is true of Great Britain in this regard is similarly true of Germany. I say again that every one of those countries has exhausted its quota each year to the utmost in the issuance of immigration visas. It is only because of the wastage, which averages about 6 per cent, that occurs between the issuance of the visa and the actual physical arrival of the immigrant, that it is correct to say that any country does not use its quota. If that is said, it is true of every other country just as it is true of any one.

At the present time, the Department of State estimates in a letter to me dated May 3, 1929, that the total number of applicants waiting for British visas was 111,940 on March 15, 1929, which is sufficient to exhaust the British quota for more than three years to come under the 1890 basis and sufficient to exhaust it for nearly two years under the national-origins basis.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly repeat the figure? I am not sure that I understood it correctly.

Mr. REED. Certainly. There were 111,940 persons waiting on March 15, 1929, on the list to get their visas from Great Britain. On the other hand, a similar estimate was made for Germany which shows that the registered demand against the German quota is 54,816 and the estimated number who would apply if there were no restrictions is 46,014, or a total estimated admission of 100,830 persons, which is sufficient to absorb the present 1890 quota of Germany for nearly two years and would be sufficient to absorb the German national-origins quota for nearly four years.

It is correct, therefore, to say that every nation gets all the visas now that our law permits, that there is a wastage of about 6 per cent in the arrivals, and that the number of waiting applicants in Germany and in Great Britain is enough to exhaust the quota for several years to come. In other countries the demand is greater. I do not know that we need to go into the detail of it very much, but the fact is that in some countries the estimated demand is sufficient to exhaust the quota for the next 1,200 years. That sounds absurd; but in Turkey, which has a quota of 100, the demand is registered at 120,000, or 1,200 times the quota. In Greece the demand is 140 times the annual quota; in Austria it is 38 times the annual quota; in Bulgaria it is 150 times the annual quota. In Italy the estimated demand is 78 times the present quota, and even at that I figure it is an underestimate. I was told by the Italian commission of immigration—and they make a careful study of immigration in that country—that he believed the demand there was sufficient to exhaust the present quota for more than 200 years if everybody desiring to emigrate lived, which, perhaps, they will not do.

As to the quality of immigration, it has been suggested that England has many people now on the dole, who are out of work, and that if we increase the British quota the result is going to be that we shall get the least desirable of the British population; that we shall get people who are on the dole, people who either do not want to work or are not desirable for employment. The implication which goes with that is that that is not the case in Germany. I have two sources of information on that subject; one of them the statement of unemployment in those two countries which is rather significant. On December 31, 1928, in Germany there were 748,760 trade-unionists wholly unemployed and 1,702,342 persons receiving unemployment doles. While in the whole United Kingdom of Great Britain the number of persons similarly on the list for doles was 1,333,611, the unemployment in Germany being about 50 per cent greater than in great Britain. Obviously, that is no argument against the readjustment of the quotas as provided in the national-origins plan.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does it seem unreasonable to suggest that the man who does not want to work would not leave England, where he had a dole, and come to America, where he would get no dole?

Mr. REED. I think it is pretty obvious that he would not do so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course, it is.

Mr. REED. There was a good chance afforded to try that out last year in England. The Canadian wheat farmers were in desperate need of harvest hands. An invitation was sent for the immigration temporarily of several thousand unemployed British coal miners. There was a world of trouble in making up the quota, although those men were unemployed. When they got to the farms most of them left in less time than they had agreed to serve. Some of them would not even go to the farms when they got to Canada, and some of them took a look at them and turned right around and went back to the cities. The experiment was a dismal failure. Those people do not want to emigrate.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. Not only that but the British Government offered these men higher wages on public works in their own country, and they declined the offer.

Mr. REED. Exactly. We are not going to get that kind of immigrants. Generally speaking, the kind that we shall get from both of these countries are the more enterprising, those who have more vision, those who have intelligence enough to compare our living standards and wage standards with their own. We are going to get, I think, from both countries a very much better quality of immigration than those on the present dole list. Here is what the British themselves think about it. I am reading now from an article which was published in the Christian Science Monitor on April 2 last, a telegram from London:

> British employers find themselves in somewhat of a quandary regarding the new American immigration quotas, which practically double the number of immigrants the United States will accept from Great Britain and Northern Ireland.
>
> The British quota is increased on July 1 next from 34,007 to 65,721. It is realized that a larger volume of emigration is an urgent necessity for the densely populated United Kingdom, and while there is a certain satisfaction that American lawmakers have seen fit to grant an increase of British applicants, while cutting down the quotas from other nations, there is a feeling that such a high grade of immigrants as will be insisted upon by the United States ought to be diverted to Canada and other parts of the British Empire.
> It is recognized that the American consuls will grant visas only to people of character and respectability. This means that expert British mechanics now comprising the backbone of the country's industry have the best chance of acceptance and will naturally be attracted by the high wages and prosperity of America. Those who have been unemployed many months or years, however, will have small chance, it is said, of coming up to the standards of moral character, physical capacity, and industrial fitness which the new American law requires.

That is what they think is the likelihood regarding British immigration.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator this question: How is a man who is out of employment and living on a dole going to meet the requirements as to paying his passage over to this country?

Mr. REED. He can not do it; and if some one else pays his passage he would be barred for that reason. If he has been on the dole, at about a pound a week, he is very unlikely to have on his person the amount of money that we require as evidence that he will not become a public charge.

Mr. CARAWAY. He has been a public charge in his own country.

Mr. REED. He has been a public charge there, and that is the best evidence that he would be one here. The consuls are not going to give visas to people such as that. The consul does not want to have himself criticized by the State Department here by sending over a lot of people who meet with rejection. The figures are very carefully kept; every consul's work is checked against the admissions here; and if he passes a lot of people who are bound to become public charges, and, therefore, are rejected at the port of entry, it tells on his own efficiency record. For their own sakes the consuls will not do that. So I say people on the dole, if they had the initiative and energy to emigrate, could not find the steamer fare on which to come, and if they did come they would not get in.

Mr. President, there is a certain significance in contrasting the proponents and the opponents of this resolution which we are now considering. Let me read to the Senate the names of just a few of those who have stirred up this agitation. Of the organizations that are opposed to the national-origins clause, I find on the list the Steuben Society of America. I presume Senators know what that organization is. It is an oath-bound secret society, to which only Americans of German blood are eligible. It was inaugurated at a meeting in New York in May, 1919, for the purpose of arousing a spirit of greater solidarity among German-Americans. The program of the society, as proclaimed by one of its members, who writes about it in the Progressive Magazine—and that is where I take the statement I am reading—calls for—

> A revision of the treaty of Versailles; return of German property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian; reversal of the verdict that Germany was responsible for the World War; revision of the treason texts in the school books; the protection of naturalized Germans; the restoration of the German language in the public schools—

And then, I am glad to say—

> The defense of the Constitution and independence of the United States—

And next—

> To show the Germanic contribution to American civilization—

And, finally—

> To repeal the national-origins provision of the immigration act of 1924.

That is the Steuben Society, secret, oath bound, to which only German-Americans are eligible.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. It is only fair to say of this organization that it numbers many citizens of very high character.

Mr. REED. I am sure of that.

Mr. COPELAND. And it is not to be wondered at that immediately after the World War they felt ostracized and separated, in a sense, from the rest of Americans. My observation of the activities of this organization, as I have seen it in New York, is that it has been loyal and devoted. Of course, all of us feel, or many of us at least, that we were a little slow about the return of alien property.

Mr. REED. Yes; but we are the only nation of all the allies which has returned alien property.

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad that we are. It shows our generous spirit. However, I am sure the Senator does not desire at all to reflect upon the organization to which he has referred.

Mr. REED. Not at all, and before the Senator came into the Chamber I took occasion to say that I admired the Germans as immigrants; I have no fight against them; my fight against them ceased with the armistice. They have made good citizens; they make good citizens; but I disapprove intensely the preservation of this kind of German national consciousness among American citizens, and I would disapprove it just as intensely if it were British or Italian or French or any other nationality.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I venture to say that whatever need there may have been for this society at the time it was organized, perhaps, it has passed away now; but we can quite understand how persons coming from an enemy country during the World War—and we recognized it and saw it in our own contacts—felt that there was a bitterness between our people and the Germans. I know a great many fine German citizens, friends of mine, who felt depressed and unhappy over the situation. So, if they did fly into an organization of this kind, possibly they were fully justified at the time. My own judgment is that whatever grievance they had or thought they had has now disappeared to a great extent, certainly, and there is not now the same reason for the organization as there then was.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think that the justification for this society had disappeared on the 12th of last July?

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, when once an organization is started, there are always those who continue active in it. I should say frankly that I feel at this time there is no occasion for any organization for some of the objects mentioned.

Mr. REED. I agree with the Senator. Now, let me tell the Senate what happened. On the 12th day of last July a committee of the Steuben Society visited Mr. Hoover, and after they had left a statement was given out by the national chairman that the Steuben Society expected to vote as a unit for Mr. Hoover; that they were very happy about his announced intention of repealing the national-origins clause. So the Steuben Society's reason for existence apparently was still in full force last July. My authority for the statement I have just made is the New York Times of July 13 last.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will bear with me——

Mr. REED. Surely.

Mr. COPELAND. There was an announcement—and, of course, I may say that, as a Democrat, I was somewhat disturbed by the announcement I saw—that the Steuben Society was going to support the Republican ticket.

Mr. CARAWAY. They seem to have kept their word.

Mr. COPELAND. I think they did, to a great extent; and there were other groups who did. The farmers, for instance, voted the Republican ticket, and they are now reaping the reward of it.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, he must have taken great comfort from the subsequent statement by the Steuben Society's executive committee that on further reflection—this was along in September or October—they had decided to support Governor Smith.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, there was comfort in that.

Mr. REED. They are versatile, if nothing else.

Mr. COPELAND. But my observation about all such organizations is that after all they rarely vote as a unit, and the voters vote about as they would under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. REED. I hope so.

Mr. COPELAND. But there was a very strong element in that society for Mr. Hoover; there was another element for Mr. Smith; and then, when they got through, the Republicans voted the Republican ticket, and the Democrats voted the Democratic ticket.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no, no, no! If they did, somebody counted them wrongly.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. McMASTER. Whatever may be the objects and purposes of the particular society that the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania mentions, it is also true that every nationality takes a natural pride in its home country, its language, its history, its traditions, its literature; and I dare say, in regard to the measure which is under consideration here now that every nationality in this country is interested in this matter in one way or another, and it has a natural right to be.

I want to say, however, in a general way in regard to the Germans and the Scandinavians in the Northwest that they have constituted one of the most powerful forces in building up that country. They are one of the finest types of citizenship that we have in that section to-day; and I can not conceive that they are in any way associated with any element or have any intent or purpose which is not good toward our institutions in any shape, manner, or form. If this particular society is interested in this law, it is also true that every nationality that is represented in the United States is likewise trying to exert its influence in a beneficial way for the particular nationality which it represents.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Americans of British descent were to form an oath-bound secret society, to which only that kind of Americans were eligible, for the purpose of controlling the action of Congress, I hope to Heaven I should be among the first to discover it and denounce it here.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, that does not represent the entire German population in the United States. There may be other organizations in this country of other nationalities that are trying to do the same thing so far as this law is concerned.

Mr. REED. Surely, Mr. President.

Mr. McMASTER. The mere fact that you criticize an organization that has certain purposes does not mean that the entire nationality of which that organization may be a part coincides with the views of that organization, nor is it anything that reflects upon that particular nationality.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator had been here a little while ago he would have heard my statement that I yield to no one in my admiration for the German immigrant as a law-abiding citizen and as a desirable part of the composition of the United States, and nothing that I have said is intended to reflect on him; but I say that when any national group forms secret and oath-bound societies to swerve the action of this Congress, the quicker we get it out into the daylight the better.

Now, I want to go ahead with some more lists.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. REED. Yes; I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Would the Senator make the same application to the churches that are seeking to influence the action of the Congress?

Mr. REED. The churches? I am not talking about the churches.

Mr. COPELAND. Not on this matter, but on any other?

Mr. REED. I have troubles enough on this matter without going out to look for more.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DENEEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Pennsylvania is more familiar with this legislation than anyone else and is more largely responsible for it than anyone else. May I ask him if it is not a fact that every one of the organizations to which he is now referring as opposing the national-origins plan was before our committee urging against any legislation and saying that it would discriminate against "their country"?

Mr. REED. Absolutely.

Mr. HARRIS. Not one of them made the statement that the legislation we were trying to enact would discriminate against this country; but they said "their country."

Mr. REED. Always; always. The consciousness of the dual nationality was always present in their arguments, and I sometimes wondered which was the paramount allegiance that they owed; but they talked about "their country"—meaning their country of origin—as if there was still a distinct allegiance.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think they mentioned the Constitution about the last thing in their decalogue, did they not?

Mr. REED. That comes just before national origins.

I read the first name on the list of supporters of the resolution now under consideration, the Nye resolution. The first is the Steuben Society of America.

The next the Czecho-Slovakian National Alliance.

The next the Lithuanian Alliance of America.

The National Croatian Society.

The National Polish Alliance.

The Order of the Sons of Italy.

The Polish Citizens' Club.

The Ukrainian National Association.

The Clan-na-Gael.

The Ancient Order of Hibernians.

The United Irish-American Societies.

The American Association for the Recognition of the Irish Republic.

The Swedish-American Societies.

The Order of the Sons of Norway.

The Church Council of the Swedish Evangelical Lutheran Church.

And so it goes. Those are all opposed to national origins.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Now let me read a list of a few that urge our support of national origins, and then I will yield to the Senator from Illinois:

The Allied Patriotic Society of New York and the same society of Washington.

The American Defense Society.

The American Legion.

The American War Mothers.

The American Legion Auxiliary.

The American Gold Star Mothers.

The National Allied Veterans' Patriotic Organization.

The Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York.

The Chicago Association of Commerce.

The Colonial Daughters of the Seventeenth Century.

The Disabled American Veterans of the World War.

The Daughters of the Cincinnati.

The Daughters of the Colonial Wars.

The Daughters of the Union Veterans of the Civil War.

The Government Club of Chicago.

The Order of Independent Americans.

The Immigration Study Commission of California.

The Junior Order of United American Mechanics.

The Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The Military Order of Foreign Wars of the United States.

The Military Order of the World War.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator think that any of those organizations gave any very serious thought to this subject?

Mr. REED. Yes; they sent a deputation here which testified most intelligently to an understanding of it. It was one of the principal subjects on the agenda of the last conference of the Daughters of the American Revolution. I know they have given thought to it.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator does know that nine-tenths of these organizations simply pass resolutions without ever giving any thought or any study to them. I am sure the Senator does not want to give the Senate the impression that because some organization sends some propaganda down here to the Senate he feels that we ought to vote blindly simply on that account.

Mr. REED. Not a bit; but I wanted the Senate to contrast the list of proponents and opponents of this law, and I will show the Senator presently some evidence that they have done real thinking about it.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that the truth about the matter is that this is getting to be a government by propaganda of one sort or another. We are constantly citing to one another that this organization or that organization wants certain legislation, and that we ought to be guided because this organization or that organization wants it. I think the views of the Senator from Pennsylvania or the other members of the committee who have given the matter thought ought to carry much more weight than the views of any propaganda organization of any kind or character.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator; but let me read a few names from the list. I want to abbreviate this as much as I can. The list is two pages of fine typewriting:

The Sons of the American Revolution.

The National Woman's Relief Corps.

The Naval Order of the United States.

The New York Board of Trade. That is a different body from the New York Chamber of Commerce, which I read awhile ago.

The Society of Colonial Wars.

The Blind Veterans of the World War.

The Women's Overseas Service.

The Patriotic Order of the Sons of America. They have given thought to it, all right. At almost every meeting the matter has been discussed by them. All of us have had hundreds of letters from them about it.

The Sons of Confederate Veterans, Eastern Division.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Just one question. The Senator spoke about an organization that had taken up this subject at every meeting. Does not the Senator think that the popular idea is that this national-origins law is really a provision for the restriction of immigration?

Mr. REED. I think everybody knows that it further restricts immigration by 11,000; yes.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the reason why this law has made such a strong appeal to many patriotic societies is because of the belief that it restricts immigration, and materially so. I believe that any measure that is presented here seeking to lessen the number of immigrants would be a popular measure with the societies mentioned by the Senator; and, perhaps, if it were on the same basis as the present law, it would be popular even with some of the societies on the other side.

For myself, I feel that the country wishes restriction of immigration—I have not any doubt about that—and that any measure that has in it the hope of restriction is bound to be popular; and, frankly, I think that is the chief reason why the patriotic societies and high-minded organizations mentioned by the Senator are for it—because they think it has in it the hope of material restriction of immigration.

Mr. REED. The best answer to that is to read to the Senate just what the American Legion said about it in its statement to us at the last hearings on the subject in April of this year. It occupies about a page of the record.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. I heard the Senator read a lot of names, but I did not hear him read the name of an organization known as the Ku-Klux Klan. Did they say that they were in favor of this resolution?

Mr. REED. I have never heard from the Ku-Klux Klan. I started my public career by a public denunciation of them as un-American, and they do not write letters to me any more.

Mr. WHEELER. I appreciate that the Senator has not any affiliation at all with them in any way, shape, or form. I did not mean to imply that he had; but I understand that they are carrying on a very strong propaganda in favor of the national origins law.

Mr. REED. Then, if they are, to that extent they are right.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I have not heard the Senator refer to the association known as the Children of Italy, who have indorsed national origins.

Mr. REED. Have they? I did not know it.

Mr. NYE. They have, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we will see whether these organizations have indorsed this blindly or not. This statement of the American Legion is only one of many. We have all had letters from them. We have all had telegrams, I think, from the national commander of the Legion—I am going to read one in a moment—but when it is suggested that they support this national origins blindly because it cuts down immigration a little more, I would like to have the Senate hear just what the American Legion has said about it. I read now from page 75 of our last hearings:

> The Legion believes firmly in restrictive immigration. We believe that this is our country and that we are entitled to be the judge of whether we shall allow people to come here from foreign countries to make their home with us or to say to them, "We now have sufficient persons of other races within our shores."

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GLENN. Does anybody question that we have that right? Is anybody disputing that fact?

Mr. REED. It seems to be disputed by the Steuben Society. Perhaps, instead of dissecting this statement by arguments, the Senator would better let me finish it. I think it is one of the clearest patriotic calls I have heard in many a long day.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I again yield to the Senator. I wonder what this RECORD is going to look like when we are all through? I hope that whoever tries to read it will pick out my remarks like the plums from a cake.

Mr. WHEELER. I presume the reason the Senator is stating that he favors this is because it cuts down immigration.

Mr. REED. That I favor it for that reason?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. REED. I favor it because it goes to the integrity of the whole policy of immigration restriction.

Mr. WHEELER. I was going to say——

Mr. REED. During the time the Senator was lunching at his comfort I was trying to explain that, but I will be glad to explain it again.

Mr. WHEELER. I heard the Senator. I presume the Senator will be lunching at his comfort before the afternoon is over. Would the Senator favor excluding all immigrants for a period of two or three years?

Mr. REED. If we can not keep it impartial, I would favor an utter exclusion of all immigration; yes.

Mr. WHEELER. I was going to say to the Senator that, as far as I am concerned—and I think a great many other Senators feel the same way—I would like to see all immigrants excluded for a certain period of time, excepting those who have to come into the United States on account of their families being here.

Mr. REED. There are only two plans which are impartial. One of them is to take all the population, as we try to do by this, and the other is total exclusion. That is impartial. If I can not get one, I am for the other.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. I have been listening to the Senator, who is making a very able, eloquent, and convincing speech. It seems to me the difference between the Senator and his opponents is this: He thinks the percentage of immigration ought to be based on the total number of people who came to this country from the beginning of the Government up to 1920. His opponents think we ought to select a special class, special favorites, as shown by the census of 1890. Is that true?

Mr. REED. That is exactly correct.

Mr. SWANSON. And base the percentages only on those people?

Mr. REED. That is exactly it, Mr. President. They would make an aristocracy out of foreigners who were here in 1890.

Mr. SWANSON. Those who are to be made special, to be approved, revered, and honored, are the foreigners who were here in 1890, and they alone will be given the privilege of furnishing the basis for immigration from their countries.

Mr. REED. That is just what it comes down to.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, the position the Senator takes is this: That every man in this country at the foundation of the Government, every Revolutionary soldier, every man who fought for the country, the people who came into the country in 1810, in 1820, in 1890, or any other year, are entitled to be counted equally and have the immigration based on that count, and that is what the Senator means when he speaks of equality and justice?

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. COPELAND and Mr. GLENN addressed the Chair.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not yield to anybody for the moment. I want to speak to that last suggestion.

If the argument as to 1890 prevails, then there will be an aristocracy in this country which will determine the question of immigration, and because in 1890 there was a large number of Germans here in comparison with the other foreign born, in the next hundred years we will get about 6,000,000 more people of German blood into the population of the United States than we otherwise would. While that group of the 1890 foreign born, including the most recently arrived, illiterate, unnaturalized immigrant from some back region in Russia, are considered in the future policy of the United States, at the same time men who fought for their country and the descendants of the men who fought for their country in the Revolution; the men who colonized this country in the beginning, when colonization was hard; the men who framed the Constitution; the brave men who fought on both sides in the Civil War—all of those are to be disregarded and ignored in favor of the recently arrived Russian peasant.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. That is what would be done if the quotas were based on the 1890 census.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. REED. I do not yield to anybody for a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. REED. I say that we Americans who were born here are as much entitled to be recognized as that most recently arrived immigrant. I do not say that we are to assume to ourselves any superiority, but I say this is my country and that I, who have lived here all my days, am just as much entitled to be considered as is the man who walked down the steamer gangplank in time to be counted in 1890.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Immigration and I have not heard the entire discussion of this matter, but I would like to have the Senator from Pennsylvania state the reasons why anyone thinks that the foreigners who came here in 1890 are deserving of more privilege in the count than foreigners who came in 1800 or 1810. What reason do the opponents give for insisting on a preference being given to those people, and all quotas being based on them?

Mr. REED. The only reason I have heard is that national origins is supposed to be inaccurate, and I have shown it is not anywhere near as inaccurate as is the 1890 basis, that the variations between these quotas on the chart and the estimates given us by the Census Bureau in 1924, when we passed the law, are far greater than any variations that have been shown in national origins.

Mr. President, now let me turn to more eloquent lips than mine. Let me take the statement I started to read of the American Legion, and I want to begin at the beginning; and while I am reading I beg that I be not interrupted.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will not the Senator allow me to say a word to the Senator from Virginia before he leaves the Chamber?

I was much interested in what the Senator from Virginia said about giving preference to those who fought in the Revolutionary War. That would mean, then, that half our immigrants would be Irish.

Mr. SWANSON. If they fought in the war, they are entitled to it. I would not favor excluding them if they were here at that time. Is the Senator trying to reduce their percentage?

Mr. COPELAND. I think we are safe in assuming that in the Revolutionary War half the soldiers on the American side were Irish.

Mr. SWANSON. Then they ought to have credit. Anybody who stood up for our country in those perilous times ought to have credit in determining the matter of immigration.

Mr. REED. Just to answer the suggestion made by the Senator from New York, a little while ago I quoted from the authority invoked by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] to show that down to 1850 we had no immigration from southern Ireland.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. I just want to ask a question for information. It seems to me that the meaning of the Senator's recent statement is that it is based upon those who came in in 1890. Are we to understand that literally, or is it based on those who had come up to and including 1890? Does it not take into consideration those who came in 1848?

Mr. REED. If they were still alive and were listed among the foreign born in 1890, they are included and considered; that is correct. But if the immigrant of 1848 had died and had a son born in this country, that son would be excluded.

Mr. ALLEN. I just had in mind an old man I know who came to this country when he was very young, who is very old now. He came to escape military service in Germany, and before he had learned to talk our language he joined the Union Army and fought four years for the salvation of the Union. He is included in this list that now is being excoriated, because he is within the 1890 period.

Mr. REED. Yes; he is included, and all his comrades in his company who fought shoulder to shoulder with him are excluded, because they had what, under the contention, would be the misfortune to be born in this country.

Mr. ALLEN. Why are they excluded? They are not concerned.

Mr. REED. Because it is limited to foreign born.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is excluded, but he would not ask any other fate than to be excluded. He is not concerned in this problem.

Mr. REED. I am very vitally concerned in the nature of the immigration that comes to my country; of course I am.

Mr. ALLEN. Of course, the Senator is; but he can not say that because this man has been taken into consideration, having been born an alien, it is unjust to me that I am not being taken into consideration as to my rights touching the matter.

Mr. REED. That is exactly what I do say. I say to use him as a basis for the quota and to exclude me is profoundly unjust to me.

Mr. ALLEN. But we do not exclude the Senator.

Mr. REED. But you do. You base the quotas only on the foreign born who were here in 1890.

Mr. ALLEN. We are talking about foreign born, whether they came in 1890 or prior to 1890, within the range of the years—of the foreign born who came here in the early days.

Mr. REED. I am afraid the Senator and I do not start with a common understanding. I am talking about the basis on which immigration quotas are calculated.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the Senator has answered the question I desired to have him apply his mind to for a moment—that is, when you get down to the consideration of the merits of the problem—the Senator is basing his objection to basing the quotas only upon those who came in 1890. He is basing it upon all who came prior to 1890 within the range of their present life.

Mr. REED. The national-origins plan bases the quotas on the entire white population of the country in 1920.

Mr. ALLEN. So I understand.

Mr. REED. The 1890 basis apportions the quotas according to the number of foreign born who were listed in the 1890 census. Basing it on that only, and excluding everybody who was born in this country and everybody who has come since 1890, does those latter groups a profound injustice. That is what I object to.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well. The thing that stands out clearly seems to be that after all we expect some foreign immigration, and that this is no deeper a problem than to decide just the best basis for foreign immigration.

Mr. REED. I wish I could agree with that. If we apportion our immigration impartially, the system will endure. If we discriminate unfairly, the system will be constantly open to attack.

Mr. ALLEN. Now, I want to ask the Senator this question: Would it not be better, as a matter of merit, as a matter of arriving at a scientific certainty, if we should delay this problem for a year, making it subject to the study of a joint committee, in order that we may add to the basis of immigration features which the law does not now provide—for example, a better system of selectivity, in order that we might have set up certain priorities subjecting themselves to the quotas in the various countries—so that when we do come to the final determination of this question men will not rise as ignorantly as I did a moment ago to present a problem to the Senator that goes back to the very beginning, to the meaning of the words "national origins"? I am asking for the Senator's opinion upon the advantage of a better study than the problem has had up to this time, and so far as the presentation of this debate has exposed that subject.

Mr. REED. Delay was indicated in 1927 and 1928 because the quota board experts showed that they wanted more time to study the subject. Those same experts tell us now that their researches are finished, that further investigation will not alter their conclusions in any material degree, and the act contains power for the correction of any error that may in the future be found in the calculations.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it not true that nothing in the act, or in any other act, makes any provision for a program of selectivity in reference to tradesmen provisions? We may want a farmer and get a chimney sweep from the streets of London.

Mr. REED. The act gives preference to agricultural laborers.

Mr. ALLEN. But would we not have a more scientifically poised basis of immigration if there existed a scientific method of selecting, through priorities, those we wanted in this country and needed at the moment?

Mr. REED. The chimera which every student of this subject has chased is this idea of selective immigration.

Mr. ALLEN. Why should there be a chimera?

Mr. REED. Because the 96 of us who are in this body could never agree on the standard upon which that selection shall be made. We never could agree whether males were preferable to females, for example. We never could agree whether farm laborers were preferable to more educated clerks. We never could agree whether a professor was better than a skilled mechanic. We would be in a maze of disagreement.

Mr. ALLEN. Would it be possible to have a special study with special ability to answer a special need? There have been times when that has been the case.

Mr. REED. That matter has been the subject of special study and most intense study by many students for a long time.

Mr. ALLEN. I grant that.

Mr. REED. The very bill that is now the law was for weeks before the Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. But the methods of study have all been upon upon the quantity theory of immigration more than upon selectivity of the immigration. It has only been in recent years that we have talked about the hope of some scientific selectivity. My objection to both provisions is that neither goes far enough, that there is opportunity for still greater limitation with benefit to the country, with all due respect to national origins, and that there is an opportunity to make a better immigration bill by a deeper study of the processes of selectivity and by the establishment of priorities which do not now exist in the law.

Mr. REED. Far be it from me to oppose any improvement in the bill, but I think pending that scientific study we had better keep on going as far as we can, and we had better not revert to something that we know is wholly unfair. I am willing to join the Senator in any amount of study, but I am unwilling to postpone further the going into effect of the law which we wrote in 1924 after most intense study at that time. If we can improve on it, well and good, but no reason has yet been stated why we should not let it go into effect in accordance with the President's proclamation on the 1st of next month, and I think it is going into effect.

Mr. President, as I said, a more eloquent tongue than mine has told why these patriotic societies are interested in and agressive on this subject. I want to begin again at the first of the American Legion's statement made to us by Colonel Taylor at our meeting on February 4 last, and I ask to be allowed to finish it without interruption:

(1) The Legion believes firmly in restrictive immigration. We believe that this is our country, and that we are entitled to be the judge of whether we shall allow people to come here from foreign countries to make their home with us, or to say to them, "We now have sufficient persons of other races within our shores."

(2) As we favor restrictive immigration, the question of how the immigrants should be chosen is of paramount importance. The selection of immigrants upon the basis of the foreign-born population resident in America at any selected date is manifestly unjust, and opens such a basis to the charge of discrimination. This discrimination must inevitably exist, regardless of the census upon which it may be based.

(3) The theory of the national origins of the entire population of the United States is therefore the fairest basis upon which immigration quotas may be based. It comprehends our entire population, just as the selective service act of 1927 included the entire young manhood of the Nation, regardless of race or creed.

(4) During the World War 2,000,000 persons resident in America of foreign birth, claimed exemption under the draft because of their alienage. Yet, should we continue to base our quotas upon the foreign-born population, the countries of which these slackers are natives would be allowed to send additional immigrants to America on their account, although no account would be taken in immigration quotas of the native-born Americans who responded so admirably to the call of their country.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I decline to yield

Page 90, Table 23, of the second report of the provost marshal general, 1919, shows that 1,703,000 aliens were registered in the draft up to September 11, 1918. Page 452 of the same book, paragraphs E and F, shows that 914,950 aliens were deferred and exempted because of their alienage. These were:

Alien enemy exempted, 334,949; resident alien, not enemy, claiming exemption, 580,003; total, 914,952.

This was more than one-half—to be exact, 53 per cent—of those registered, claimed exemption, or were exempted or placed in a deferred classification because of their alienage, and were never called.

What better argument for the national-origins provision could be advanced?

The issue can be brought squarely between patriotism and slackerism—shall slackerism be represented in selecting our immigrants over patriotism?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator that he may let me finish. I made that request before I started reading. After that I will yield to him indefinitely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLEASE in the chair). The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. NYE. Very well.

Mr. REED. I continue:

The American Legion has more than 860,000 members and our auxiliary 350,000 members. We number within our membership all races, creeds, and nationalities. It is a crosscut of the Nation. We are not the advocates of immigration from any special nation or groups of nations, but we emphatically uphold the theory underlying the national-origins provisions, which is that immigration quotas, based upon the entire population of the Nation is not only the fairest method for selecting immigrants but is the most certain method of retaining for the future the blend of population and racial mixtures as they exist in America to-day.

The national-origins provision is a part of the basis law of the act of 1924. The temporary basing of the quotas upon the census of 1890 was an arbitrary expedient placed in the law until such time as—and only until—the national-origins provisions could become effective. This required additional study in order to determine the quotas which would be provided under it.

The charge has been made that national origins as a basis for quota immigration is unworkable. Nothing could be farther from the truth than this statement. The Congress can set up arbitrary quotas for any foreign countries, regardless of population and census figures—can choose immigrants or exclude them as it sees fit.

Any system of selecting immigrants based upon the foreign-born population at any particular period is open to the charge of discrimination, and justly so. But to base these quotas upon the national origins of the entire Nation can not be open to the charge of discrimination, for under such a plan the newest immigrant coming to our shores stands upon the same footing as the descendants of those who came here 300 years ago and founded this Nation in the wilderness.

That in general, Mr. Chairman, is our attitude on the national-origins provisions of the 1924 act. It is in the law now. The 1890 census was an expedient. The national origins has been twice extended.

We earnestly beseech you, Mr. Chairman and this committee, to use your best efforts in seeing that now the national-origins clause of the immigration act be put into effect.

Is there any doubt that that society has thought about the subject and is not merely "cackling out a lip service" because somebody has asked it to do what it did not understand?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield now to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. That they had not given it deep study is indicated by the very language which was resorted to in the hearing from which the Senator read. From what the Senator has read I repeat this:

The issue can be brought squarely between patriotism and slackerism. Shall slackerism be represented in selecting our immigrants over patriotism?

Then:

During the World War 2,000,000 persons resident in America of foreign birth claimed exemption under the draft because of their alienage. Yet, should we continue to base our quotas upon the foreign-born population, the countries of which these slackers are natives would be allowed to send additional immigrants to America.

I want to ask how in the world national origins is going to cut off immigration from those so-called slacker countries?

Mr. REED. Of course, no system wholly stops immigration in any country.

Mr. NYE. Of course not.

Mr. REED. But to base our quotas on the foreign-born with that record of response to this country's needs seems to me to be a very poor reply to make to the men who defended the country and ask only that they be treated exactly alike.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. Is the Senator from Pennsylvania entirely satisfied with the basis of representation provided by national origins?

Mr. REED. Yes; entirely.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. I regret that I am not more fully in accord with the Senator from Pennsylvania. I know his earnest and deep interest in the subject. After he had concluded reading the statement from Colonel Taylor, the representative of the American Legion, made before the Committee on Immigration, he asked a question of the Senate if anyone could say that that society representing the Legion had not made a deep study of the subject. I think, in the interest of clear thinking and correct understanding, some challenge ought to be made to the implication suggested by the question.

The American Legion early became interested in the question of restriction. Many legionnaires deeply had the idea of exclusion. It was natural, I think, that those who had served abroad during the World War and had come in contact there with the elements of the French Army which included the French territorial Asiatics and the French territorial Africans, and who had seen something else of the foreign element there, should look with alarm upon the idea of a great influx of those people or any of the foreign people to our shores. The Legion therefore very early took up the idea of restriction. It is true the Legion is committed, not only by its national organization, but through its State departments and meetings of posts throughout the land, to the idea of restriction of immigration. I do not think it follows, however, and I say this with all respect to the opinion just expressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that because Colonel Taylor, who is a representative of the Legion here at the National Capital, has taken up the idea of national origins, that the Legion itself has made a study of the subject.

Let me tell the Senator of an incident called to my attention yesterday or the day before. I received in the mail a newspaper clipping relating to how a speaker had appeared before a Legion post and how he had argued against national origins as a basis of admission into our country, how he had made the argument against it upon the ground that it took into consideration not only the American citizens, but it took into consideration the foreigners within our shores just as the Senator from Pennsylvania has so many times pointed out during the course of the debate to-day. He criticized that as being unfair to Americans and as being unfair to the foreigner who comes here and attains American citizenship and as putting a premium upon the foreign-born immigrant who comes here and does not even seek to attain American citizenship.

According to the newspaper story, this speaker suggested that, after the next census, when the total number of American citizens was again brought down to date, we should revise our immigration law by the utter repeal at this time so far as that is concerned of national origins, and then that we should base it wholly upon the origin of the different groups who have attained citizenship as Americans in order to put a premium upon Americanism.

That suggestion, which I am not proposing here as my own, according to the newspaper reports, the members of the post stood up and applauded. Let me say that that was merely an appeal, of course, to their patriotism, but it would indicate to me that, so far as that particular post was concerned, they were not very deeply wedded to the idea of national origins.

Mr. REED. What does the Senator think they would have said if the 1890 method had been described to them, which includes all native-born Americans?

Mr. STEIWER. I think they probably would have disapproved of that. Let me go a little farther, if I may without trespassing too seriously upon the Senator's time.

I hold the Legion in just as high honor and pay it as deep reverance as the Senator from Pennsylvania. I am very, very proud indeed that I am permitted to be a member of that body. I have attended many meetings of its posts. I have attended numerous meetings of the departments and department conventions.

I have heard literally scores of discussions of the question of immigration; I have heard literally scores of men suggesting that there should be either exclusion or restriction; but I can state very truthfully to the Senate that I have never yet heard there one man expressing himself as being in favor of the national-origins system; and I think it is literally true that outside of those circles where its representatives are working at the National Capital the Legion has given but little consideration to the mechanics of the law of restriction, for after all whether the 1890 census or the national-origins plan shall be used as a basis just goes to the question of the mechanics of the restriction; it is just the means or the mode by which we arrive at the thing in which we are interested.

Mr. REED. The Senator will be interested, then, in having me read this telegram to him.

Mr. STEIWER. Of course, I shall be glad to hear the Senator's further explanation; but I wish to say just one other word and then I shall take my seat. It seems to me, if I may say so to the Senator, that the question after all ought not go to the arithmetic of the method or to the mechanics of the method; it ought not to be determined altogether by what is most fair—though, of course, we do not want to be unfair—and it ought not to be determined altogether by the right of any other nation. I should like to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania before he concludes his very able and interesting speech say to the Senate, "I favor this method because it is best for America." I should like to hear him say and I should like to hear others who are debating this important question say that they favor a certain proposal because they feel that it is best for America; for I think that there is no obligation that we owe either to England or to Germany or to any other nation that is comparable, even in the slightest degree, to our obligation to our own country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have been saying at intervals for the last three hours that I thought the national-origins plan was best for America, and I am very glad to reaffirm it.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. I shall do so in just a moment. I should like first to read this telegram in reply to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], who said that he did not think the American Legion as a whole had given any thought to this matter:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., May 20, 1929.

Hon. DAVID A. REED,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The American Legion strongly urges the retention of the national-origins provision of the immigration law. The American Legion from the very first has supported the present immigration law, and at the tenth annual national convention in San Antonio last October the organization positively reaffirmed its stand by the adoption of the following resolution:

"Be it resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled, That we favor and recommend the continuance of the method of restriction upon immigration in the 1924 immigration law, with its fundamental national-origins provision."

I respectfully and emphatically request that you exert every effort to support the American Legion's position.

PAUL V. MCNUTT,
National Commander.

If the word of the national commander, in response to the action of the national convention, does not come pretty near to showing what the attitude of the American Legion is, I can not imagine what would do so.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania in regard to the attitude of the American Legion in favor of the national-origins system that the Florida branch of the Legion adopted a resolution to that effect, which I placed in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. Many such resolutions have been put into the RECORD.

Mr. CARAWAY. Has there been any resolution from any American Legion post opposing the national-origins proposition?

Mr. REED. I think there have been one or two in Boston, but I know of none other. Now I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, what I rose to say is, perhaps, not so timely now as it was prior to the reading of Commander McNutt's message by the Senator from Pennsylvania; but it was my good fortune to hear National Commander McNutt address a large and enthusiastic audience in my home city of Albuquerque, N. Mex., about the 15th of April last. He devoted a part of his address to a discussion of this question. It was an able and clear discussion of the subject. He urged the national-origins plan in a most earnest and convincing way. My observations of the legionnaires present was that they were almost unanimous, if not entirely so, in joining their national commander in supporting and urging the retention of the national-origins provision in the present law.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just to conclude that subject, I have a letter which is dated to-day from Col. John Thomas Taylor, vice chairman of the national legislative committee of the Legion, which I send to the desk and ask to have read at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1929.

Hon. DAVID A. REED,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: An examination of yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 5, page 2440, shows that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], in discussing the national-origins clause of the immigration act, referred to my testimony for the American Legion on this subject, quoting in part from page 76 of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Immigration, in particular reference to alien slackers during the World War.

A portion of the Senator's comment upon this is as follows:

"There were slackers, Mr. President, in the late World War; but I have not seen the advocates of national origins demonstrating who they were and from what countries these slackers came during the late war. They have not contributed these slackers * * *."

I wish to say that the Senator is entirely correct in thus commenting upon my testimony. The American Legion contains men with blood strains from all the nations involved in the present issue—the Legion is a crosscut of our Nation just as our World War army was.

For this reason, if for no other, the Legion would not make a charge of "slacker races." As a matter of fact, the alien slackers referred to came from all nations—cobelligerent, neutral, and enemy or allied enemy—and the figures quoted comprehend the nationals of all European and American nations other than our own.

The specific point the Legion had in mind is that where the foreign born alone count as a basis for immigration quotas, slackers who sought and obtained exemption from military service in our Army on the ground that they were aliens, would contribute to the quotas of the countries from which they came—and this contribution would be an element of importance.

On the other hand, the national-origins basis counts native born as well as foreign born in determining quotas—and, of course, the native born far outnumber the foreign born in the United States.

Should an immigration plan be advocated which based the quotas solely upon the native born, and wholly excluded the foreign born from contribution thereto, the foreign born would justly have cause for protest at thus being ignored.

The national origins comprises all—native born, foreign born, patriot, slacker, and alien as yet unnaturalized. Could any basis than this be fairer to all? Could the alien within our shores ask for any more generous treatment than that which places him side by side with the native-born American citizen and foreign-born American citizen in determining what countries shall contribute to the future population growth of the United States of America?

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR,
Vice Chairman National Legislative Committee.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GLENN. I have been impressed by the fact that among the comparatively few Members of this body who belong to the American Legion there is apparently a decided difference of opinion as to the two plans now under consideration. I recall having been advised by some one connected with the American Legion that in the national convention of that organization, which was made up of more than a thousand delegates, the resolution which the Senator has recently read was adopted by a unanimous vote. That leads me to believe that there was not full and ample consideration of this grave question, because if eight or nine Members of the Senate who belong to the American Legion, after having heard the question discussed and debated ably at length day after day, can not agree as to which of the two plans is the better, I do not understand how a thousand men, coming from every State in the Union, including those of German, English, Italian, French, and practically all other nationalities, can unanimously agree after full debate. So I think there is something in what the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] has said. In this debate we have heard much discussion about which is the fairer plan of these two; which is fairer to the Revolutionary fathers, to the Pilgrims who came across on the Mayflower, and which is fairer to England, Germany, France, Italy, Czechoslovakia, Lithuania, and all other countries. At least nine-tenths of the discussion on the pending question has been along those lines. I give great credit to the able manner in which the debate has been conducted upon both sides, but I think the main consideration for us to have in mind in our vote upon this question is, as the Senator from Oregon has said, Which is the fairer plan to the present population and the future population of the United States of America?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator sits down will he give us a single reason why the 1890 basis of quotas is fairer for America?

Mr. GLENN. I will attempt to do so.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will.

Mr. GLENN. I asked the Senator, who has made a great study of this question, to explain why it is that the national-origins plan is the fairer plan, and he said because it takes into consideration every element of our people who are here from wherever they may have come and whenever they came, be they Germans, British, Irish, Scandinavians, Swedes, Italians, Lithuanians, or of whatever nativity. The gentleman whose letter was just read asked what plan can be fairer than one which considers and counts everyone of every race who is here now. If that is the goal the Senator from Pennsylvania seeks, I ask him why is it that there have been deliberately excluded from consideration and from the count twelve or fifteen million other citizens?

Mr. REED. For the very good reason that the twelve or fifteen million negroes of this country do not want to be included. They do not want to have a quota assigned to the Congo, and we do not want one.

Mr. GLENN. Certainly; and yet the Senator says he included everybody. This man says, "We will count everybody; we will take them all in, no matter where they are from."

Mr. REED. Does the Senator advocate giving a quota to the Congo?

Mr. GLENN. I do not advocate it; but if the Senator claims that his plan considers everybody, he has no right upon that basis to say that 15,000,000 of our people should be excluded. He should count them all or not claim that he is counting them all under this plan. I say that the Senator can criticize the colored people all he wants to——

Mr. REED. I have not criticized them at all.

Mr. GLENN. No; the Senator is not criticizing them; he is excluding them without criticism. The Senator can talk about those that fought upon the various battle fields in all our wars; he can talk about "slackers" all he wants to; but upon that basis he has no right to exclude the men—colored men, black men, negroes—who wore the American uniform, if it is upon the basis of patriotism.

Mr. REED. I am afraid I do not understand the Senator. Does he or does he not want to have a Congo quota?

Mr. GLENN. I want this: I want the Senator either to say, "Our plan counts everybody," as he has day after day; I want him to say to the Senate, "In this national-origins plan we have gone to every country from which any man has come who is here to-day, and we have taken into consideration every man," or I want him to say frankly to the Senate, "National origins is not national origins. National origins is just a part of national origins." Let not the Senator parade his plan as one thing when in fact it is another.

So far as I am concerned, I would just as soon have negroes as I would have some of the people whom the Senator's plan would admit to America, and with whom we have had fully as much trouble as we have had with negroes.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator specify the people whom he would rather substitute? [Laughter.]

Mr. GLENN. Oh, no; I am not going to specify them. The Senator knows that. He does not expect me to do that. Will the Senator tell me why he excludes the negroes? As a great Republican from a great Republican State, filled with Republican colored voters, why does he, under his plan, exclude the negroes? Will the Senator tell me that? If he will tell me that, perhaps I will answer his question.

Mr. REED. I shall be delighted to do that. We will have an exchange of information that is going to enlighten everybody. [Laughter.]

In drafting the immigration law—both the 1890 basis, for which the Senator has developed this sudden affection, and the national-origins plan—we have excluded from quotas the Chinese, the Malays, people in the barred zone of southern Asia, and the negroid tribes of central Africa; and by almost universal consent it was to the best interests of America that we should. The colored people of this country—and I make no reflection whatsoever on them——

Mr. GLENN. Certainly not.

Mr. REED. The colored people of this country have acquiesced in that.

Mr. GLENN. By whom?

Mr. REED. By whom? By every colored man who ever discussed the subject with me. They do not want any more immigration from the Congo. I do not want any more, if the Senator wants my opinion.

Mr. GLENN. Does the Senator want more immigration from Turkey?

Mr. REED. I should be interested in having the Senator from Illinois tell us frankly whether he does or does not want any more. If he does not, we have nothing to fight about. If he does, I should like to debate the matter with him.

Mr. GLENN. Will the Senator name some of the other countries?

Mr. REED. No; let us start with the Congo. How does the Senator feel about that?

Mr. GLENN. I should like the Senator to answer my question first.

Mr. REED. I asked the question first, and I have the floor, and it seems to me that the Senator might answer my question. He has brought up this question about a Congo quota. Now, I should like to find out what his position is in regard to it.

Mr. GLENN. I would just as soon have a Congo quota as I would an additional quota from some of the other countries or nations.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator say "Dalmatians"?

Mr. GLENN. No; I did not say "Dalmatians"; I said "nations."

Mr. REED. Oh! If the Senator would tell us which nations he has in mind, we could debate it; but we are stuck at the Congo.

Mr. GLENN. The Senator knows that there are other places besides the Congo.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator want 2 per cent of the number of negroes who were here in 1890 to come in each year from the Congo? And if so, does he want them to come to Illinois?

Mr. GLENN. I want the Senator to designate his plan under the right name. I do not want him to appeal here day after day and hour after hour, saying, "This plan is fair because we have gone clear back to the Revolution, clear back to the Mayflower; we have selected the stock, and we have designated national origins. Nobody is discriminated against. It is the only fair plan. We take everybody that is here. We do not discriminate against anybody. We take everybody that is here. That is our plan—national origins."

Mr. REED. I am very much flattered. The Senator must have been listening to me.

Mr. GLENN. I have listened very attentively to the Senator, so far as I could.

Mr. REED. Will not the Senator, before he sits down, answer my first question as to why he thinks the 1890 basis is fair to anybody?

Mr. GLENN. I will tell the Senator why I think it is fair.

I do not think we owe anything to Great Britain now because some one came over in 1880. I do not think we owe anything to Great Britain or Italy or any of the other countries because some one came in 1890, or because some one fought in some war. I think the question is, Under which plan will America get the better class and grade and character of immigrants from now on? The Senator from Pennsylvania has discussed that matter very briefly. I say to him that in my judgment there is no better class of immigrants coming to America than those who have come from Germany, from Sweden, from Norway, from Denmark, and from south Ireland. I do not think there are any better immigrants.

Who are the people who have developed the great West and Northwest of ours—the most virile, live, vigorous part of America to-day? The Scandinavian people, whom the Senator's plan would reduce some 50 or 60 per cent.

I say that the Senator can talk all he wants to; he can praise as greatly on this floor as he has set forth his love for the German people, and how much he thinks of them——

Mr. REED. I have no love for the German people, and have not stated it. The Senator perhaps had better quote accurately while he is about it.

Mr. GLENN. Well, then, the Senator's great respect and admiration for them, and the fact that he has no feeling against them.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLENN. I say to the Senator that back of this whole fight, in my judgment, is a feeling against the German people. You can cover it up all you want to; you can deny it all you want to; I do not charge the Senator with it, but I do charge against certain of the people who are back of this fight that it is very largely a feeling against the German people—a feeling that has not quite died out after the war 10 years ago.

Mr. REED. The Senator has made this very interesting. Will he explain to us why the German people, for whom he has this affection, should have a quota nearly double that of England, Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland combined? Why is that just, Mr. President?

Mr. GLENN. I think, in the first place, that the class of German immigrants we are getting now and have been getting in recent years is a class superior, generally, to some of these others. We might as well deal frankly with each other about this matter. We are all talking here about our admiration for these various nations and how we respect all of them; and yet back in our minds, in our real and deliberate judgment, we know that there are people who will be admitted under either plan that we would much prefer not to have here at all. I think there is a better class of citizens coming, in a general way—more frugal, more industrious, more thrifty—from those who will be reduced under the national-origins plan than from the other countries that the Senator mentions. That is what I believe.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield; and to whom?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. It ought to be at least interesting, in connection with what the Senator has said, to note this fact: We are discriminating to a degree, or at least the German, the Irish, and the Scandinavian people are given reason to feel that there is a discrimination against them under the national-origins clause. Is it any wonder that they should feel that it is discriminatory, in view of the fact that while we are limiting the number who can come from their countries we are not raising our finger against the 50,000 or 60,000 people who are coming into our land each and every year from Mexico?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we have raised our finger many times against the Mexican immigration; and it is just dragging a red herring across the trail to use that as an excuse for maintaining the present discrimination of the 1890 basis.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. In reply to what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] said about being prejudiced against Germany, I desire to say that I am in hearty sympathy with the position of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have discussed this question with many Senators on both sides. I have never heard one of them at any time mention the subject that the Senator from Illinois has injected into this debate.

Prejudice against Germany has not operated at all with me in considering this question. We all regard the German people as a great people; and I believe, as President Wilson said toward the close of the war, that the war was not a war of the German people but was a war of the Kaiser and his military crowd.

There is no prejudice in this matter so far as I have been able to ascertain; and the Senator from Illinois is the very first one to inject that subject into the debate. I have not heard it suggested in cloakrooms, on the floor of the Senate, in private conversation, or anywhere else; and I believe the Senator from Pennsylvania can bear me out in that suggestion.

Mr. REED. I think so; and to-day is the first time I have heard it suggested that we might adopt a quota for the Congo regions of Africa. [Laughter.]

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I did not make that suggestion.

Mr. REED. The Senator has refused to say that he does not believe in it.

Mr. GLENN. I said that the Senator has no right to parade his plan as a plan that is eminently fair, that takes into consideration all elements of our people, from whatever country they came, of whatever race or creed or nationality, when in fact it does not do that. That is all I said about it. I have not passed on the advisability of a quota from the Congo, or anything of the kind.

Mr. REED. The Senator says I am wrong in saying that it is fair, and he says that I am wrong in that because it excludes all these Congo regions. Does the Senator think it would be more fair if it did include them?

Mr. GLENN. No; I say this: I say the Senator is not fair when he says he takes into consideration all classes and all nationalities of our people. That is the reason why the Senator says it is fair—because it takes them all in; but it does not take them all in. It leaves out 15,000,000; so the Senator's argument that it is fair, on that basis, falls.

Mr. REED. But I can not make out whether or not the Senator thinks it is unfair. He says I am wrong in saying that it is fair.

Mr. GLENN. The Senator is wrong in saying that it is fair on that basis. Instead of saying it takes in everybody, no matter where he came from or when he came, or whether he is a Methodist or a Catholic or a Jew, or what his nationality or race is, the Senator should say, "It takes in everybody but 15,000,000 of us, so it is fair." That is all; let the Senator go ahead and make his argument on the real basis on which the plan is founded.

Mr. REED. The Senator is very helpful. I started by saying that this plan included the entire white population shown in the census of 1920. Now, the Senator from Illinois says that is not fair. I am absorbed by the interest of his suggestion. What would we do with this quota from the Congo?

Mr. GLENN. I have not advocated it.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator to suggest it, but he was not ready to advocate it?

Mr. GLENN. I have not advocated it. They might settle in Pennsylvania, or they might go wherever they want to. They might go where the Turks go, or the Syrians go, or the Russians go, or they might go to any of those places, just as they like. I have not advocated it; but when the Senator says his plan is fair——

Mr. REED. The Senator is right. He has not advocated it. He has merely suggested it repeatedly. Would the Senator similarly suggest a Chinese quota, and a Malay quota, and an Indian and Afghanistan quota?

Mr. GLENN. As long as the Senator does not protest at all in his great immigration plan against Mexican immigration, I might come around to that idea.

Mr. REED. I am beginning to understand Chicago. [Laughter.] Would the Senator want a Chinese quota, too?

Mr. GLENN. I say that I would about as soon have the Chinese here as the Mexicans.

Mr. REED. Now I fully understand Chicago. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, reverting to the subject of discussion, I want to read a very thoughtful memorandum that was sent to the Senate by a group that probably includes the most distinguished professors of biology and the most distinguished scientists of America. It is all well enough to argue this matter on the basis of recent questions, it is all well enough to discuss it from more or less of a political slant, but I think we can all agree that Professor Lowell, of Harvard, the faculty of biology of Princeton, the faculty of biology and political economy at Yale, and Columbia, and the University of Wisconsin, and such places, are not playing politics when they send an expression of opinion to us on this great question. Their message is a brief one, and I make no apology for reading it. It is a memorial addressed to the President of the United States, to the Senate, and to the House of Representatives. It is as follows:

We, the undersigned, all citizens of the United States, impressed with the vital importance to the country of maintaining and perfecting the present system of immigration restriction, respectfully submit to the President of the United States, to the Senate, and to the House of Representatives the following expression of our views with respect to specific aspects of this question.

1. We urge the extension of the quota system to all countries of North and South America from which we have substantial immigration and in which the population is not predominantly of the white race. We believe that without such extension the present restriction of immigration is already inadequate and will become increasingly so in the near future. During each of the last two fiscal years we have been admitting upwards of 75,000 immigrants from Mexico, the West Indies, Brazil, and elsewhere who are, for the most part, not of the white race and who, because of their lower standards of living, are able to compete at an advantage with American workers engaged in various forms of agricultural and unskilled labor.

2. We further urge the prompt putting into effect of that provision of the immigration act of 1924 whereby the quotas after July 1, 1927, at present determined by the number of foreign born of each nationality here in the year 1890, are to be adjusted so as to conform to the officially estimated number of persons now in the country of each national origin, either by birth or descent. We believe that this permanent basis for fixing the quotas, already provided for by law, is sound in principle and fair to all elements in the population. Only by this method can that large proportion of our population which is descended from the colonists and other early settlers, as well as the members of the newer immigration, have their proper racial representation in the quotas. We believe that Congress wisely concluded that only by such a system of proportional representation in our future immigration could the racial status quo of the country be maintained or a reasonable degree of homogeneity secured. Without such basic homogeneity, we firmly believe, no civilization can have its best development.

That expression was signed by Professor Conklin, professor of biology at Princeton; Ulric Dahlgren, professor of biology; L. R. Cary, assistant professor of biology; Kenneth P. Stevens, Walter M. Rankin, E. G. Butler, C. F. W. McClure, E. Newton Harvey, William Starr Myers, Philip M. Brown, and Edwin S. Corwin, of the Princeton faculty of biology and political economy.

It is signed by President Lowell, of Harvard; by Robert DeCourcy Ward, of the Harvard faculty, one of the greatest authorities on immigration in this country; by their professors of biology and anthropology; by J. N. Carver, of their staff of economics; and by several others of the Harvard faculty.

It is signed by Irving Fisher, professor of political economy at Yale, and when he speaks on statistical matters how silly it is for those who are not experts to say that this is statistically unsound.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I want to read a few of the names and then I will yield. This is signed by Professor Yerkes; by Professor Huntington, professor of geography; by Professor Edward Bliss Reed, and by several other professors of the Yale faculty.

Going to Columbia University we find that it is signed by Professor Giddings, professor of sociology and history; by Professor McBain, of constitutional law; by Robert E. Chaddock, professor of statistics at Columbia; and by Henry E. Crampton, professor of zoology.

So it goes down through the other colleges. Senators will find that reported in full at pages 160 and 161 of the latest hearings.

With such expressions as that from scientists who have no political interest whatsoever, how can we doubt the soundness of the scheme?

The other day the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] quoted from Madison Grant and his book on the Passing of the Great Race as if to imply that what Mr. Grant said was in some way an argument against national origins.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, in order that there may be no misunderstanding, I may say that I quoted Madison Grant purely and simply as a matter of proving that the element which came to us in colonial days from Great Britain was not British immigrants, and I quoted him for that purpose alone. Since that time I have announced that Madison Grant is a proponent of the national-origins clause.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator must have been misunderstood by Mr. Grant, too, because I have this telegram from him:

I am informed that statement was made in Senate yesterday I oppose national origins. This is incorrect. I support national origins because it does justice to native Americans. English and Scotch are far more Nordic than Germans.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, does the Senator appreciate what I might have said from which Mr. Grant could have drawn that conclusion.

Mr. REED. I got the impression that the Senator deduced a favorable attitude on Mr. Grant's part, but on looking over what the Senator had said, I saw that his words did not justify that conclusion.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. REED. I referred to Irving Fisher. He is known to all of us as one of the great economists of America. Let me read a telegram that has just come from him:

Senator DAVID A. REED:

Urge your opposition to further postponement of national-origins provision of immigration act. National-origins formula offers fairest way of distributing total allotment, which is scientifically and statistically sound, devoid of all emotional or racial bias, and wholly just to all elements of our present population.

Mr. President, I have almost finished. One or two things, however, remain to be mentioned. I have explained to the Senate, and have given the figures showing the demand, both in England and in Germany, to absorb the quotas under either system for several years in advance, quoting figures furnished by the State Department which conclusively put an end to the story that has persisted so long that there is no use giving a quota to Great Britain, because she does not use what she has now. The applicants for quota visas there far exceed any visas that will be available for a couple of years to come.

There is one country that does not use its present quota, and that is the Irish Free State, which is among the groups clamoring for the 1890 basis. I read the names of a number of Irish societies that are fighting national origins because it reduces the present quota of the Irish Free State, and let me show the Senate the present situation in that regard.

In Germany there remained on April 30 of this year, with one-sixth of the year still to go, only 1,500 visas out of 51,000. Obviously, they are using their quota.

In Great Britain there remained only 64 for issuance during the last six weeks of this year—my figures are dated May 17—out of a quota of 34,007. Obviously, England is using her quota.

The Irish Free State quota is 28,567, and on the 30th day of April of this year, with only two months left to go, there were remaining unused 11,155 visas. She is limited to 10 per cent a month, as I recall the law. So that the one country of importance that is not using her present quota is the Irish Free State, and from the Irish Free State come some of the most vociferous and vehement attackers of national origins.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. If I may ask the Senator, does he consider that the memorial signed by the various university professors is an unqualified indorsement of the national-origins plan?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. COPELAND. I wish they had made it a little more clear-cut. The first part of it is devoted to immigration from Mexico. How would the Senator, according to the national-origins plan, propose to fix a quota for Mexico, if that were deemed advisable?

Mr. REED. That could be done. The quota would be a very small one. But I do not want to spend too much time to-day discussing Mexico. Let me say briefly, however, that the situation is this: I believe ardently that we are going to have to restrict Mexican immigration. I do not believe it is necessary to change the law to do it; it is all a question of border patrol. The literacy test, the health test, the test about being a public charge, and the contract-labor sections are all four of them sufficient to keep out 98 per cent of the Mexican immigration, if we are able to guard the border, but obviously we can not do that now. We have not enough border patrol. There is no use talking about changing the law until we are able to enforce it. I do not think there is any good in discussing Mexican immigration at this time simply because, even if we did decide to change the law, we could not enforce it.

Mr. President, there is a certain advantage, in discussing this subject, in stating how other countries have treated us, and seeing what they permit our workmen to do who might seek positions in their countries.

The junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], who unfortunately is now in the hospital, but who has taken an ardent interest in this subject, put into the RECORD on May 25 last, at page 1904, a statement regarding the present laws of European countries which are clamoring for us to admit their nationals. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read it, but it suffices, I think, to say that Germany, for example, whose nationals are demanding that we should admit them in unlimited numbers, prohibits our workers from taking positions held by Germans in that land. Germany fixes every year beforehand the number of immigrant land workers to be admitted, and every alien worker must get a permit from the German Government.

The whole matter is too long for me to read it at this time, but if Senators will read it I think it will be observed that the entire continent of Europe closes its doors against any immigration from us, while at the same time demanding, as if they had a qualified ownership in our country, that their people shall be admitted here.

Before I finish I think it only fair to those Senators who have been troubled by the President's attitude in the matter to call to their attention the difference between the Republican platform declarations and the President's own expression. The Republican platform says nothing whatsoever about a change in the immigration law or a repeal of national origins. The plank was this:

> The Republican Party believes that in the interest of both native and foreign-born wage earners it is necessary to restrict immigration. Unrestricted immigration would result in widespread unemployment and in a breakdown of the American standard of living. Where, however, the law works undue hardship by depriving the immigrant of the comfort and society of those bound by close family ties, such modification should be adopted as will afford relief. We commend Congress for correcting defects for humanitarian reasons and for providing an effective system of examining prospective immigrants in their home countries.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NYE. Certainly the Senator is not going to maintain that the Republican Party, meeting in national convention once every four years, is going to dictate what shall and what shall not be done by its representatives in Congress during the next four years?

Mr. REED. Not at all.

Mr. NYE. The platform admittedly, then, is neither pro nor con on the national-origins question?

Mr. REED. The platform expresses satisfaction with the selection we made on the immigration question.

Mr. NYE. It could well be accepted as being an expression of satisfaction with that part of the law which has been in effect since 1924.

Mr. REED. The Senator agrees with me that there is no party obligation to work for a repeal of national origins, does he not?

Mr. NYE. I maintain that the platform of the party has no reference to the question of national origins whatsoever.

Mr. REED. That is sufficient. I agree with the Senator on that point.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. COPELAND addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. I yield first to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Where the platform expresses satisfaction with the present law, it then makes a single exception:

> Where, however, the law works undue hardship by depriving the immigrant of the comfort and society of those bound by close family ties, such modification should be adopted as will afford relief.

The undoubted meaning of that paragraph in the Republican platform is that the convention indorsed the present law, which included the national-origins plan, and merely made an exception for family reasons where families were separated, suggesting that some modification should be made in that regard.

Mr. REED. I read the plank at that time and construed it as the Senator from Tennessee now construes it. Otherwise I should have made some effort to change it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, of course.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NYE. The Senator from Pennsylvania is a member of the Immigration Committee. The Senator from Tennessee is not. The Senator from Pennsylvania therefore knows that there have been a great many bills and a great deal of legislation before the Committee on Immigration looking for a loosening up that would lessen the hardships which have been created by the law itself, and I wonder if that is not what the platform has reference to? Does it not refer to those numerous bills and those numerous efforts which have been made to loosen up the strings wherever they have worked a hardship under the law enacted in 1924?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further to make just a brief statement?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was argued throughout my State and with some degree of success that if Mr. Hoover was elected upon this platform there would be an absolute restriction of immigration, whereas if he was not elected we might have a greater number than ever of immigrants coming into the country.

Mr. REED. That was the construction I put on it.

Mr. McKELLAR. That was the argument used in every State by Republican orators so far as I know.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Pennsylvania will permit me——

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I think with his approval we may rejoice in the Senator from Tennessee, who has now become translator of the Republican platform.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was interested in the declaration of the Senator from North Dakota that the platform had nothing to do with legislation. I had always so understood it, but I never heretofore heard it declared to be the Republican platform that one could be elected on the platform and then disregard it when it came to enacting laws.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator from Arkansas not to accept the Senator from North Dakota as a conclusive exponent of Republican policies.

Mr. CARAWAY. He speaks for the President, does he not?

Mr. REED. I think so. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I am sure the Senator from Pennsylvania is aware of the fact that regardless of what the platform declaration may have been, certainly in my State, and probably in his State, it was talked from the platform, and certainly privately, that Mr. Hoover was in opposition to the national-origins plan. It was the teaching in my State, and I believe it was in Pennsylvania, that Mr. Hoover was in opposition to the national-origins plan, and that if he had his way he would have it wiped off of the statute books. That was clearly the teaching in New York.

Mr. REED. It was very hard to tell. No two of the candidates for President or Vice President seemed to agree. Certainly there was no correspondence in the views of Governor Smith and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. The Senator from Arkansas believed, I know, in the immigration law as it stands, including national origins. He is on his way back now from Arkansas to testify to that belief, making a special trip back here to arrive to-morrow to work for the national-origins clause as it stands, and yet Governor Smith, as far as we could make anything intelligible out of his declarations, was in favor of basing the quotas on the 1920 census. It was chaos, and no one could make sense out of it.

Mr. COPELAND. Let us see if we can make sense out of the Republican attitude.

Mr. REED. I have not been much more successful there. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator whether Mr. Hoover was against the national-origins plan or was he for it during the campaign?

Mr. REED. Mr. Hoover declared himself against it in his acceptance speech and then, so far as I could learn, relapsed into an impenetrable silence on the subject until his message to this session of Congress.

Mr. CARAWAY. He grew very intelligent on the question after he made his acceptance speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. The attitude of Mr. Hoover, I think, is known. So far as I can discover, Mr. Hoover took that attitude back about 1927 without consultation with any Senator or Congressman who had worked on the subject and without consultation with any member of the quota board. I have asked members of the quota board—men who did the studying and the work on the matter—whether they had been consulted by him on the question, and I was told within 10 days that he has never discussed it with them even yet. He certainly has not discussed it with any Member of Congress that I know of who has studied the subject. So that I think perhaps an expression from the President as to the workability of the act is not exactly conclusive.

Mr. COPELAND. But this is true, is it not, that Mr. Hoover in his speech of acceptance did declare himself?

Mr. REED. That is true.

Mr. COPELAND. The Republican orators in my State certainly said that that was his attitude, and I had no question that hundreds and perhaps thousands of people in New York State voted for Mr. Hoover in the expectation that he would take a firm stand against the national origins, as he did in his declaration of acceptance.

Mr. REED. And no doubt hundreds and thousands of them in other States voted for Mr. Hoover in the firm belief that he would do exactly the contrary.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am able to say that that is what was done in Tennessee: The Republican orators there all claimed that if the Democratic Party was successful the immigration gates would be broken down and immigrants would teem into this country, and it had a very considerable effect in my State and in other States with which I was familiar.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Pennsylvania now admits that he is leading an insurgent movement against the President of the United States?

Mr. REED. If I am an insurgent or pseudo, we will have to make the best of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKHART. I remember when I was a pseudo and when I got kicked out of the Republican caucus for an offense something like that.

Mr. REED. I perhaps might remind the Senator that I took this position back in 1924, when the bill was passed and became the law now on the statute books, long before Mr. Hoover ever expressed an opinion and before he, so far as I know, ever had an opinion on the subject. I am merely being consistent with the position I took then and have taken ever since.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Pennsylvania took that position before Mr. Hoover found out to which party he belonged, did he not?

Mr. REED. I am not sure about that. This matter is so much bigger than politics that I should be sorry to finish my protracted talk about it to-day in any such atmosphere as that of badinage about being regular or irregular in this attitude.

Mr. President, the permanency of the immigration restriction law determines the quality of America in the generations to come. It is the America not of our day but of our grandchildren and their grandchildren that we are to decide in what we do in this matter. All of us will be dead before the ill effects of a wrong decision will begin to show themselves. If we can keep this measure in what seems to us to be an impartial form—if we can keep it so as to say to any attacker, "We have made it as impartial as we know how to do it"—then just so much the longer will this policy be the policy of the America that we love and will be an everlasting factor in America's life.

We spend a lot of time in the country talking about farm relief and tariff, but 25 years from now there will not be any agricultural surplus, and we will be stimulating irrigation schemes so that America may feed herself on what she grows. We talk about the tariff, and 10 years from to-day nobody will know or care what we have done on the tariff back in 1929. These are bread and butter questions of the day. But the question of immigration which we work so hard to call to the people's attention and get such a poor response oftentimes determines the very make-up of the America of future centuries. It is infinitely more important than all the tariff and farm bills that any Congress could ever enact, and yet it is disposed of with one quick line in the concluding paragraph of the President's message. When pages are given to the bread and butter questions that precede it, this question, which goes to the heart of America, is given one line, and we are supposed to follow a representation unsupported by argument, unsupported by any kind of proof, merely the staccato assertion that it is unworkable, when every expert says it is not. America in the days to come will depend upon the decision of the Senate now.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I assume the Senator has concluded for the day. I should like to make inquiry as to what the prospect might be for agreement as to a time to vote upon the resolution which is now the unfinished business before the Senate?

Mr. REED. As I said a while ago, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is coming back especially for this matter. He can not get here until 1 o'clock to-morrow. Giving him a reasonable time to unpack and get to the Senate, he ought to be here in time to express his thought on the matter before we vote.

Mr. NYE. Then the Senator feels——

Mr. REED. I would rather not make any agreement until the Senator from Arkansas is here.

Mr. NYE. The Senator feels there is a possibility of a vote on this question to-morrow?

Mr. REED. I do not think it is very likely, if the farm bill conference report shall be taken up in the middle of the afternoon. I inquire of the Senator from Oregon when he expects to ask for the consideration of that report?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I conferred with the House leader this afternoon, and probably the report on the farm relief bill will reach the Senate about 4 o'clock to-morrow afternoon—somewhere around that time.

Mr. REED. That would scarcely give us time to thresh this question to a conclusion to-morrow. I do not believe there can be a vote to-morrow.

Mr. NYE. Does the Senator from Oregon anticipate pressing for immediate action upon the conference report?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have frequently stated that I am very anxious that the report shall be considered by the Senate at the very first opportunity. Of course, if some arrangement could be reached by the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Pennsylvania for a definite time to vote on the pending question, I would be willing to defer the consideration of the conference report for a reasonable length of time.

RECESS

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate take a recess, the recess being, under the previous order, until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, June 7, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, June 6, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We close the door of the busy world as we approach the altar of prayer, where our Heavenly Father waits forevermore. In Thy mercy Thou hast kept us, O Lord, and Thy might hast preserved us. Thou, who art the living God and the God of the living, hast overshadowed us with Thy fatherly presence. As our country needs the strong soul and the high endeavor, do Thou enable us to fill every position with honor and perform every duty with fidelity. We praise Thee "so long Thy power hast blest us, sure it still will lead us on." Yes; lead us on to the deeper rest and the better life; on and on to youth's immortal day while we grow old. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

On April 26, 1929:

H. R. 1412. An act making appropriations for certain expenses of the legislative branch incident to the first session of the Seventy-first Congress.

On May 2, 1929:

H. J. Res. 56. Joint resolution to provide funds for the eradication, control, and prevention of the spread of the Mediterranean fruit fly.

On May 9, 1929:

H. R. 2158. An act making an appropriation for defraying the expenses of the United States Marine Band in attending the Confederate Veterans' reunion to be held at Charlotte, N. C., June 4 to 7, inclusive, 1929.

On May 17, 1929:

H. J. Res. 59. Joint resolution to extend the provisions of Public Resolution No. 92, Seventieth Congress, approved February 25, 1929.

On May 23, 1929:

H. R. 22. An act to provide for the study, investigation, and survey, for commemorative purposes, of battle fields in the vicinity of Richmond, Va.

On June 5, 1929:

H. J. Res. 84. Joint resolution extending until June 30, 1930, the availability of the appropriation for enlarging and relocating the Botanic Garden; and

H. J. Res. 92. Joint resolution to provide an appropriation for payment to the widow of John J. Casey, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 3083. An act to amend subsection (a) of section 26 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended by the settlement of war claims act of 1928, so as to authorize the allocation of the unallocated interest fund in accordance with the records of the Alien Property Custodian.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 1648) entitled "An act to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. SMOOT, Mr. WATSON, Mr. REED, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. HARRISON to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on June 5, 1929, present to the President, for his approval, joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 61. Joint resolution to amend the appropriation "Organizing the Naval Reserve, 1930";

H. J. Res. 82. Joint resolution making appropriations for additional compensation for transportation of the mail by railroad routes in accordance with the increased rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission;

H. J. Res. 84. Joint resolution extending until June 30, 1930, the availability of the appropriation for enlarging and relocating the Botanic Garden; and

H. J. Res. 92. Joint resolution to provide an appropriation for payment to the widow of John J. Casey, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR GUY D. GOFF, OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and incorporate therein a speech delivered by Senator GUY D. GOFF, of West Virginia, before the graduating class of Linsly Institute on the occasion of its one hundred and fifteenth annual commencement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, Linsly Institute, one of the oldest collegiate institutions in the State of West Virginia, on Tuesday last held its one hundred and fifteenth annual commencement. This institution numbers among its alumni many men who have attained honored and distinguished prominence in their respective communities, professions, and vocations. Linsly Institute, I am proud to state, is located in my home city, Wheeling, W. Va.

On this occasion of its one hundred and fifteenth annual commencement a notable audience assembled to hear an address suitable to the event delivered by a Member of the United States Senate, the senior Senator from the State of West Virginia, the Hon. GUY D. GOFF. Before appending the splendid address of Senator GOFF, I desire to refer to an editorial "leader" which appeared in the Wheeling Intelligencer, one of the oldest and most influential newspapers in my home State, whose support and advocacy of the Union cause before and during the Civil War constitutes one of the important features of West Virginia's history covering that period. This editorial, which presently follows, was inspired by Senator GOFF's visit to one of the most populous and prosperous groups composing his constituency, and was a deserved tribute to this distinguished native son of West Virginia upon his arrival in Wheeling to address this year's graduates of historical Linsly Institute and their friends. It correctly reflects the favorable sentiment with regard to him personally and officially held by the people of his and my State.

The editor of the Intelligencer wrote:

Wheeling will be honored by the presence of a genuine statesman to-day, with the coming of United States Senator GUY DESPARD GOFF to deliver the commencement address to the Linsly graduates this evening.

For many years West Virginia was fortunate in having stalwarts in the United States Senate, men who met the traditions of that august body. Gen. Nathan Goff, Stephen B. Elkins, Charles James Faulkner, Johnson N. Camden, Henry Gassaway Davis, and Nathan Bay Scott were of true national reputation.

Then, for a period, West Virginia's representation in the Senate fell short of such commanding ability. It was not until 1924, when the son of one of the founders of State Republicanism followed his father's footsteps to the Capitol, that West Virginia had another statesman to match the giants of these days in service and accomplishments.

From the day of his induction into the higher chamber of the National Legislature Senator GOFF's achievements have been sound, brilliant, and many. He has served his party well, often leading and winning sharp parliamentary contests for the administration. He served his country well, with an unflagging energy and prodigal use of his fine intellectual powers in the exacting work of the Committees of Judiciary and of Foreign Relations. He has served his constituents well by always defending successfully their economic and social interests in the dispatch of public business and by giving the country a correct impression of the quality of West Virginia citizenship.

In these days of many noisy demagogues seeking high office, and of many efforts to substitute cheap expediency for enduring statesmanship, the visit of Senator GOFF to this community is an especially happy and welcomed event.

Mr. Speaker, Senator GOFF's address, delivered at Linsly Institute, Tuesday evening, June 4, 1929, was as follows:

I deem it a privilege to have this opportunity of again addressing the graduating class of Linsly Institute. You have a right to feel consciously and gratefully proud that you have completed your studies in this institution and I congratulate each and all of you. Many years ago I also was a member of the graduating class of a military school, where I prepared for the larger life beyond in the university and the schools of art, literature, science, history, and the law. I faced then the same problems which you face to-day. I had to decide upon my vocation. I have frequently looked back upon that period of experiences and ambitions and thanked God for His guidance, and also my parents and the members of the faculty of the academy I then attended for their most helpful, encouraging, and far-sighted suggestions.

It is sincerely my pleasure this evening to offer you some definite suggestions along those lines. I feel that I could not talk on a more vital subject and I shall aim to counsel with you rather than speak to you in the hope that we may reason together in the solution of your problems. Too many young men are actuated by thoughts and suggestions that should have absolutely no bearing upon the choice of their future career. Too many of the students in our schools are not giving the matter of their respective pursuits the serious attention and patience they deserve. As a result we have in the world to-day lawyers who should have been doctors, doctors who should have been lawyers, clerks who should have been electricians, engineers who should have been clergymen, and clergymen who should have been captains of industry. They are misfits in the intricate machinery of our present-day civilization. They have avocations, not vocations. They will never be successful in their chosen professions, callings, and employments because their hearts are not in their work, and therefore they do not give them the time and study they must have if they are to be successful men in their particular lines of endeavor. They are misfits because when they made their choice of a profession they were actuated by the wrong motives. They do not love their work because they did not dare. They take no pride in their profession, and they are satisfied to eke out an existing living.

You should not select a vocation merely because of the money you may earn; you should not rely solely upon the judgment of your parents; you should not be attracted to a calling merely because of the short hours of employment; and you should not, above all, pick out an occupation and decide to follow it merely because it is a so-called white-collar job. On all sides we hear people say that this profession or that calling is overcrowded. Never permit such views to influence you in making your decision. There is always room at the top of the ladder for the man who will tenaciously apply himself and who in his climbing does not watch the clock. As Lucretius saw it, "A falling drop at last will carve a stone"; and Shakespeare, recognizing the invincibility of perseverance, said: "Much rain wears the marble and beats its way within." However, you should always realize this fact: There is no easy road to success in any profession and that after all the virtue lies in the struggle and not the prize. The crown is only beautiful to those who see it—not to those who wear it. The summits are not easy to reach. The bypaths of real merit are beset with difficulties over which the finest and the best minds have ever struggled.

It is fabled in story that a man wished to reach a mountain top; unable to walk, he crawled. "Shame," cried a passer-by. "But it is a mountain top I reach," said the climber. He had the courage to endure; was possessed of an objective, balance, so to speak, between the highest purposes and the finest ideals. He paid the price of courage. He, too, knew the disturbing loneliness of doubt, suspicion, and timidity that lead to failure and distress, but he always heard the wings of joy and hope far above the valleys of fear, where he knew, and where you and I know, that the race only can find its economic efficiency, its social justice, and its individual liberty.

Those who succeed do not attain success by luck, pull, or favor; they win their laurels by going into partnership with God, and burning the midnight oil while their less ambitious coworkers, the men who complain that the professions are overcrowded, are spending their time in dance halls, in theaters, in playing cards, and all too often ruining their health by indulging in depleting dissipations. No man can stand all work and no play, and I do not approve of this. But neither do I approve or recommend all play and a minimum amount of work; that is to say, to use an expression you may have heard among some of your fellow students, just enough work "to get by."

Too often we hear parents say to a young man, "Enjoy yourself while you are young. You will be old soon enough and then you can settle down." As a result of such advice they waste the best hours of their lives when their minds are the most receptive. When they should be laying the foundation for future success, they are wasting their evenings in the idle pleasures of the hour, while those who make the best use of their time have none to spare. These are the men who call the successful man lucky; these are the men who always find a profession crowded because they can only do what the average man can do; these are the men who are always looking for pleasure and never find it because the only true pleasure, and this is the law of life, is found in work.

Life accepts no deputies coming down the by-roads when it calls the roll. It demands that its men and women answer in person—not what others have done for them, but what they have done and can do for themselves.

Everyone recognizes that learning is a valuable asset, that knowledge is power, and that an education is to the human soul the noblest of the many gifts which modern times have plucked from the grasp of the few and placed within the reach of the many.

Disraeli was once asked what was the best and the sublimest thought of his mind. He replied, "A portion of a speech I delivered in Manchester in 1844." Then taking a pen, he wrote:

"Knowledge is like the mystic ladder in the patriarch's dream. Its base rests on the primeval earth, its crest is lost in the shadowy splendor of the empyrean, while the great authors who for traditionary ages held the chains of science and philosophy of poesy and erudition, are the angels ascending and descending the sacred scale maintaining as it were the communication between man and heaven."

Are they not inspiring, these golden and charming thoughts of ancient and modern days, and do they not commit us to the pledge so to develop our minds that we, too, may have such accomplished thoughts even though we may never attain the power of such beautiful and graceful expression? Have you ever considered that many, if not most men, neglect the precious opportunities that a college course offers? This is not surprising, as every age is to its generation the climax of the world's civilization. The spirit of indifference and prejudice is at work everywhere, paralyzing effort and undermining our native as well as our acquired convictions.

"Be not deceived. God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap."

What we call fate is only the effect of causes we have unconsciously or ignorantly set in motion and which we have not yet learned how to antidote. We must learn the lessons of harmony, and we must form our characters if we would approach closer to or even vision our destiny. If we are constructive and harmonious within ourselves we will antidote the negative energy our bad habits have generated. And if we do the affirmative things of life over and over until we do them unthinkingly, then we shall acquire habits that lead to character and presage the confidence to see ourselves in the things we desire and strive to be. Thus only can we capture the objects we crave, as they will not come by force. You have observed these facts in your small college world. Every life makes its own laws, the laws under which it shall live, and it makes those laws solely through the thoughts it thinks. So learn to think wisely and to act charitably. "Charity hopeth all things, believeth all things," for he who has this love for humanity is far more likely to obtain true estimates of men and things than the man who measures them by rigid rules and theories. It is all the difference between thought and feeling. Thought tends to realize itself in deeds, while feeling has a tendency to luxuriate in itself and to be content. So avoid those emotions, affections, and the desire which intellectually cause the mind to feed on itself rather than to suggest helpful courses of action. Professor James criticizes this type thus:

"Every time a resolve or a fine glow of feeling evaporates without bearing practical fruit, is worse than a chance lost; it works so as positively to hinder future resolutions and emotions from taking the normal path of discharge. There is no more contemptible type of human character than that of the nerveless sentimentalist and dreamer who spends his life in a weltering sea of sensibility and emotion, but who never does a manly, concrete deed."

How many men can you recall who have consistently and persistently done the best intellectual work of which they were capable or who have stood uncompromisingly against the things which no dispassionate judgment could approve or who have rendered their best service and always been strenuously in earnest about everything? To count them would not tax one's mathematics. Man has within himself all the creative powers of mortal achievements. Like builds like and like attracts like. Man must first have his castles in the air before he can have them on the ground—realize them in objective form. So the thinking of vicious thoughts generates an energy that causes us to assimilate on the objective plane with conditions that are hurtful and wrong. Often, too often, we fail to distinguish between an impression and an intuition. Impressions have their origin solely in the objective, while intuitions come always from within. Impressions are not always safe to follow unless we know their origin. Their danger lies in the fact that they may come from deductions learned years ago and stored up in the subconscious mind.

The great majority of American students drift comfortably along, predisposed toward certain theories of life, without any undue exertion in the way of either work or sport. We must concentrate to succeed. We must vividly create the vision, the image of the thing we want or desire to be. Intellectually we must hold fast to these thought pictures, and by doing our duty, doing the things nearest at hand, constructively, harmoniously, and without resentment or resistance, they will soon become fixed habits in our lives, and as such a part of our characters. It has been said that every man is born either a Platonist or an Aristotelian—that is, he has a mental drift in the direction of the one or the other, an affinity for thought or action. The college boy, unfortunately, is not unique among his fellow countrymen. They are not vicious; they are merely indifferent, like the overwhelming majority of us, who, as their elders, ought to be their betters, and too frequently we are not. If one could be sure that in turning his back on the college he would leave behind him the indifferent and the irresponsible spirit that may have impeded his development there, one might feel thankful that the college had been beneficently provided as an escape, and look forward with confidence and hope to the future of both the individual and the Republic.

The life of every nation rests on what may be called its fixed ideals, the ideals which have become axioms in the souls of its citizens. They are stronger than the fundamental laws, because they give to fundamental law its spirit and its strength. The law of this Nation to-day is not only the expression of its character but the sole and only factor in its character.

And the church, if its influence is to be widely and lastingly good, must preach the gospel of love, loyalty, faithfulness, and humility as exemplified in the perfect life of Jesus Christ. It must appeal to the intellect of man. It must arouse and then realize his ideals and always touch the best in every human soul. As Kant so well puts it: "Moral culture must begin with a change in the way of thinking and with the founding of a character." The philosophy of Kant may appear dreary and unprofitable, but there is a noble passage in it which I always read and recall with a new and helpful meaning.

"There are two things which the more I contemplate them the more they fill my mind with admiration—the starry heavens above me and the moral law within me."

In that great thought we have mortal proof of the physical and the divine—the vision of life everlasting—transient though our earthly existence may be. And if the men and women of to-day do not carry with them into life some enthusiasm, zeal, and conviction, they are not likely to acquire any, for smug contentment, indifference, as I have said, is a trait that the schools share with the great outside, educated and uneducated alike.

There is one department of life in which you will learn and must master your lesson, and that is in the professional and the business world. The struggle for a livelihood is too grim, lean, and anxious to admit of indifference. A man must work feverishly, ardently, enthusiastically, and think, weigh, and ponder if he is to succeed; for new, daring, and inspiring ideas are engendered only in a clear, sober head over a glowingly honest heart. The conditions of modern life compel earnestness, seriousness, devotion, and consuming interest on the part of those who labor. To attain even a modicum of success, with which most men must be content, is a task which requires conviction, industry, and self-sacrifice. It is the way our hours of freedom are spent that determines our efficiency.

The subject is as old as the hills, but of perennial interest. As Ovid said, "To wish is of slight moment; thou oughtest to desire with earnestness to be successful." And George Eliot expressed it: "The only failure a man ought to fear is failure in cleaving to the purpose he sees to be best." Take the word "success"—what is it? It connotes something tangible, energetic, and ingenious in its everyday meaning. We open a dictionary and read, "a favorable or prosperous determination of anything attempted." If the lexicographer is correct, a man may be successful, though not distinguished, if he do well his appointed task, even as a hewer of wood and a drawer of water.

Man must have an ideal. It is as natural as it is for him to indulge in hope. What heredity begins environment completes, forming our characters and shaping our careers. The ideal is imaginary and perhaps unattainable, but the highest type of excellence is never reached without it. The ideal is a growth, but it leads to great truths and eternal laws. It keeps man patient when the world ignores him, and calm and unspoiled when it praises him. Unconsciously, as you know, we must create mental pictures of what our work is to be, but to do good work we must never forget that our best efforts are but an imperfect expression of what we wish to do. People seldom improve who copy after no higher ideal than themselves. Let me urge you to lose self in an ideal. Admiration of great men living and dead evokes an imitation of their qualities. Time is of no moment with great ideas, since they are the most lasting products of human thought.

Homer will never die. Plato will ever teach his transcendent philosophy. Horace, Virgil, and Dante will ever sing; and the mind of Shakespeare is a more active force to-day than when he lived, and thought. Emerson fittingly expressed it in the embalmed thought, "Institutions are only the lengthened shadow of a man." "Tell me whom you admire," said Sainte-Beuve, "and I will tell you what you are." "Do you admire mean men? Your nature is mean. Do you admire rich men? You are of the earth—earthly. Do you admire men of title? You are a tuft hunter. Do you admire brave and manly men? You are yourself a brave and a manly spirit." Such is the power of inspiring example and stimulating suggestion. They are the greatest forces in human life. They are the school of mankind. They guide us and teach us all that has been thought, said, and accomplished.

Speaking roughly, as we well know, there are two classes of men; men of thought and men of action. Neither can be spared, for life is ideal as well as real. Temperament is destiny, but it is the mentality inventive and practical man who wins first place. The secret lies in being alert, hopeful, and alive to all that is going on around you, in adjusting yourself to your conditions, in being sympathetic, receptive, and having forethought.

Buxton says: "The longer I live the more certain I am that the difference between strong and weak men lies in the fact that the strong man has invincible determination, an indomitable will, a purpose once fixed and then victory or death." We never arrive at our destination. We are always journeying. If we are wise, we always change our mind, because when we reach the goal we set, we see another just a little bit ahead. You will be misjudged by the ignorant, but be not discouraged and do not lose your temper. When the world sees chips on a man's shoulder they are apt to think they fell off a blockhead. Man should not make a virtue of humility; that is wrong, just as it is absurd to assume a blustering and domineering attitude of mind. Strength does not exhibit itself, but weakness always swaggers and blusters to conceal itself.

Emerson told the truth when he said: "Good luck is another name for tenacity of purpose." In order to do great things it is necessary to live as if one was never to die and to appreciate that men succeed less by their talents than by their characters. Character is greater than ability. It is the diamond that scratches every other stone, and no man therefore need plead average ability as an explanation of his failure. Lecky in that most inspiring book, The Map of Life, sums it all up as follows:

"One of the most important lessons that experience teaches is that, on the whole and in the great majority of cases, success in life depends more on character than on either intellect or fortune. Many brilliant exceptions no doubt tend to obscure the rule, and some of the qualities that succeed the best may be united with grave vices or defects; but on the whole, the law is so well defined that it can not be questioned, and it becomes more and more apparent as civilization advances. Temperance, industry, integrity, frugality, self-reliance, and self-restraint are the means by which the great masses of men rise from penury to comfort, and it is the nations in which these qualities are most diffused that in the long run are the most prosperous. Even the most splendid successes of life will often be found to be due much less to extraordinary intellectual gifts than to an extraordinary strength and tenacity of will, to abnormal courage, perseverance, and work power that springs from it, or to the tact and judgment which makes men skillful in seizing opportunities, and which of all intellectual qualities are most closely allied with character."

I recall an epitome in verse of life's opportunity with and without action:

"Isn't it strange that princes and kings
And clowns that caper in sawdust rings,
And common folks like you and me
Are builders for eternity?
To each is given a bag of tools,
A shapeless mass and a book of rules,
And each must make, ere life is flown,
A stumbling block or a stepping stone."

Let me also impress upon you this fact: Don't disparage or indulge in carping criticism. If you have merit, you do not increase it by pointing out its lack in others; and if you lack it, you can not obtain it by criticizing others who may also be lacking. If you must search for it, the most inviting field is oneself. So do not indulge in these weaknesses. They not only become vices but they will consume your time and destroy your energy. It is therefore well to realize this constant experience: That every man's life is a race with the wolves, and that whoever outstrips his fellows is a mark for their hungry teeth.

Young men, you have reached the time in your lives when you must think for yourselves. The coming man will and must be a specialist. Expert knowledge carries with it the supply and demand, the sum, the concretion, the result of the influence of the present time. Most of you no doubt have already decided upon your life's work. You who have made this decision should firmly resolve to love your mission and never to stop until you have reached the top rung of the ladder. You who have only half decided upon the profession you are to follow should consult your parents, your teachers, and your more mature friends concerning the opportunities open and presented in all fields of endeavor. It will not take long to narrow your choice to one, two, or possibly three. You should talk to those who are engaged in these professions; you should procure literature explaining the opportunities for advancement and read it; and before deciding on any one particular vocation you should study yourself and be sure after such introspection that you have the personal characteristics necessary for success in any such calling. It would be a mistake for a man to be a soldier if he has a poor physique; a man can not be a singer if he can not sing or has no ear for music; and a man who dislikes figures should not be an auditor or an accountant. So do not fail to analyze yourself carefully.

If you do these things, I am confident you will not be misfits; that you will be proud of your professions or occupations, and the road to success, although steep and difficult to ascend, will always be open to you. Success will make enemies, but pay no heed to criticism, always forge ahead, never forgetting that slander spells achievement, while sympathy may mean failure or be a sop to weakness. Don't take things too seriously, but be cheerful and cultivate a sense of humor; for did not Mark Twain lose all his money and joke his way back to competency?

And then, too, remember the value of tact, courtesy, adroitness, and patience. They are the mind to conceive conditions as they are—the understanding to express and the hand to refrain. "Tact," says Lecky, "is not merely shown in saying the right thing at the right time and to the right people; it is shown quite as much in many things that are left unsaid, or lightly or evasively touched." A weak man will call another a liar on insufficient evidence; a strong man avoids such vanity and conceit and by restraining his speech keeps a patient, a client, or a customer. La Bruyere, with his accustomed insight, aptly remarks that "it is a misfortune not to be able to speak well, nor to have sense enough to hold one's tongue."

Mental capacity resolves itself into genius, talent, and average ability. The majority of us have neither genius nor talent. We belong to the thousands who possess average ability, but other things being equal—and they are not always so—the best brains win. Business or professional success is to-day difficult enough of attainment, but it is worth aiming at. There are already too many "keys" and "secrets," the result being that the keys do not fit and the secrets do not reveal. There is no legitimate work or industry, from plowing to administering the state, which is not worthy of man's whole-hearted enthusiasm and devoted, honest exertion. The world always adjusts itself to the age, and always adjusts the men and the women in it to the period in which they exist. Therefore every man—every young man—should enter his chosen career with an eager desire to achieve an eminent success, even though it be the reward of the very few. Not every man can make a distinguished success, but he can try, and if he fail, as most of us do, let it be because of defect in capacity and not because of moral deficiency, indifference, or mental laziness. To work is the law of life and a man's part in this modern world. Not every man can do the work that shows in the great fabric of the intellectual and material prosperity of the Nation, but if one's contribution must be small because his capacity and his opportunities are humble he has no right to make it humbler still by not even doing his small best.

You will find your place in life by tracing your strongest desires on the map of life, as Sydney Smith phrased it, "Be what nature intended you for, and you will succeed." This means that strong minds are often those whom the noisy world hears least. Energy—that is what we all need. Are we ready for hard and unsparing work; the work of planning improvements and overcoming stern obstacles? Are we willing to allow a moderate margin for recreation, instead of a gospel of half work and half play? Do we believe in ourselves, and do we self-reliantly trust ourselves? The man who does not believe in himself sufficiently to strike out an individual course and follow his own conclusions must be written down as a failure. Self-reliance and self-knowledge go together. So, make it a point to observe your habits, analyze your tastes, curb your desires, and control your appetites, and in that way know what you can and what you can not do. And whether you succeed or not, be serious, hard-working, industrious men, for seriousness and industry are the sterling moral qualities, and such qualities, thank God, are within reach of every man among us. And whether you take a seat in the high places or astonish the world you will reap the rich reward of industry and the still greater reward of an honored and friendly name in what should be to you a wholesome, beautiful, and righteous world.

To you who will soon receive the diploma that makes you real sons of Linsly Institute, representatives in whom the outside world may properly judge of the aims and standards of those illustrious halls of learning, I wish to repeat to you the warnings of a great teacher: "That we henceforth be no more children tossed to and fro and carried about with every wind of doctrine," or as Mr. Kipling emphasizes it, "We are neither children nor gods, but men in a world of men." The educated man can do no greater service in this generation than by showing stability and temperate enthusiasm in the midst of the general whirlwind. You have been taught how to think, and it is your duty as chemists in the great laboratories of thought, native and acquired, to analyze clearly and as seriously as you can, undeterred by the perplexing difficulties of the task, and unappalled by the certainty of intellectual and logical precipitants differing from your associates and friends. You are and you always must be intellectually free, but without courage and conviction you will be the slaves of other minds. And never allow yourselves to be deceived ever by catchwords or be caught or entangled by specious phrases. Distrust any doctrine that can be summarized by a terse phrase or slogan. Such advice costs nothing and all too often it is worth what it cost. It may be sound, but the probabilities are against it. The truth is generally too complex to be comprised in a phrase. Macaulay is not the only man who has sacrificed truth to an epigram, so beware of popular shibboleths.

Flash the light of penetrating insight and reality upon it. Bring every new proposal under the scrutiny of your judgment and consider it in the light of its history. Only thus does one view things in their true proportion and in their real perspective. Only thus can one estimate the magnitude and the importance of any subject which may arise in our lives and require our well-reasoned judgment. As educated men you will see in history not a mere sequence of events but an eternal process in which rule those divine laws of which Sophocles says, "Not to-day nor yesterday were they created, but from all time, and no man knows when first they were brought forth," and so you will, and may you never pause, grow in faith and realize that no one generation ever revolutionized the world, and that genuine truth begetting progress is of necessity slow.

May I leave with you a concluding and, I trust, a helpful, thought. There is no truer success in this mortal struggle than to find the truth and contribute a little toward the betterment of human affairs. Such an ideal brightens victory and makes us more resigned in defeat. There will be moments of doubt, days of weakness, but if we are fit we will answer the exactions of life and survive, an honor to ourselves and an example, perhaps, to others. You will come in contact with the broad instincts of humanity. You will learn to know the heart throbs and the actual needs of men and women. You will feel and you will experience, you will appreciate each other, and the world will have your sympathy. From you much will be expected, and from you much will be received, if you live honorably, advise fairly, act honestly, and always do your duty in the succession of the little and the great things.

If I should be permitted to name the most resplendent ideal in your life, I would unhesitatingly answer, love of duty. After all is said and all is done, when the play is over and the player gone, duty alone remains, not success for its own sake, but the doing justice between man and man, our brother and the stranger within the gates. This may seem the commonplace, but there is no lasting action except duty accomplished. There may be nothing heroic in it; the incentive will often be lacking and at times it will cost us the admiration and the respect we crave. Yet if we but have faith in common chances, be content with our part and our share in the common hope, be true to the highest ideals, our lives will be worthy of record, even though they remain unwritten. "Follow thy star, thou can'st not miss the glorious port."

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from the Third Assistant Postmaster General to Mr. William Tyler Page, Clerk of the House of Representatives on the franking privilege of Members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, July 23, 1928.

Mr. WILLIAM TYLER PAGE,
Clerk, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PAGE: In reply to your letter of the 18th instant, in regard to the franking privilege of Members of Congress, I have to say that section 85 of the act of January 12, 1895 (28 Stat. 622), embodied in sections 479 and 481, Postal Laws and Regulations, provides as follows with regard to the franking by Members of Congress of public documents and mail upon official or departmental business:

"The Vice President, Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives may send and receive through the mail all public documents printed by order of Congress; and the name of the Vice President, Senator, Representative, Delegate, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House shall be written thereon, and the proper designation of the office he holds; and the provisions of this section shall apply to each of the persons named therein until the 1st day of December following the expiration of their respective terms of office. (Sec. 479, Postal Laws and Regulations.)

"The Vice President, Members and Members elect of, and Delegates and Delegates elect to Congress shall have the privilege of sending free through the mails, and under their frank, any mail matter to any Government official or to any person, correspondence, not exceeding 1 ounce in weight, upon official or departmental business. (The limit of weight for official correspondence under this paragraph was increased to 4 ounces by the act of April 28, 1904, 33 Stat. 441, sec. 481, Postal Laws and Regulations.)"

Except as indicated in the preceding paragraph, the limit of weight of public documents and matter on official or departmental business mailed under the frank of a Member of Congress is governed by the law embodied in section 450, Postal Laws and Regulations, which, in so far as it is applicable to matter mailed under the frank of a Member of Congress, provides that the limit of weight of mail matter "is hereby declared to be not exceeding 4 pounds for each package thereof * * * except for books and documents published or circulated by order of Congress."

It will be seen from the foregoing that the 4-pound weight limit does not apply to public documents. However, in order that a package may be exempt from this restriction as to weight and be mailable under frank, it must contain public documents only. If a package or box weighs more than 4 pounds and contains any matter in addition to public documents, it is not frankable. A package containing stationery and correspondence constituting the official files of a Member of Congress addressed to himself, to be mailable under frank, must not exceed 4 pounds in weight. Correspondence sent by a Member of Congress upon official business to other than a Government official can not be mailed under frank if it exceeds 4 ounces in weight.

If matter which is not frankable should be inclosed in a package or box with public documents, the whole would be thereby rendered unfrankable.

The foregoing is the law which governs the mailing of all public documents and official matter by Members of Congress, and is applicable regardless of whether the matter is deposited for mailing at Washington, D. C., or at any other post office.

Sincerely yours,

R. S. REGAR,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.

MISSOURI SOLDIERS IN OVERSEAS CEMETERIES

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a brief letter from the Quartermaster General, together with a copy of the list setting forth the names, organizations, and burial places of Missouri soldiers in the World War, who lie in overseas cemeteries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter from the Quartermaster General, together with a list of the organizations and burial places of Missouri soldiers in the World War who lie in overseas cemeteries.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conferees on the agricultural relief bill may have until midnight to-night to file their report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the conferees on the agricultural bill may have until midnight to-night to file their report. Is there objection?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add that we are assured that the committee will have it ready to-night and, if so, it will be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, I want to say that I see by the morning paper that Senator McNARY announces that to-morrow at 3 o'clock he hopes to take up the conference report. I assume that he expects that the conference report will be passed by the House and sent over to the Senate before 3 o'clock.

Mr. TILSON. I hope so.

Mr. GARNER. Can the gentleman give us any information as to when we may expect them to get through with the conference report?

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman might ask me something easy. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman knows that every Member is interested in that matter. Many Members would like to leave immediately after the conference report is agreed to, and many will leave. Can the gentleman tell us when the Senate will pass the resolution and send it to the House providing for a recess?

Mr. TILSON. I have no definite information that would be worth anything. I have been in conference with the leaders of the Senate and others, but we have not reached a conclusion. There is nothing definite to be said on the subject, and what I have to say might mislead rather than enlighten.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not understood that as soon as the farm relief bill is out of the way the Senate will undertake to pass a resolution for a recess?

Mr. TILSON. That is my information.

Mr. GARNER. That was the reason I asked the gentleman when, in his opinion, the Senate would agree to the conference report.

Mr. TILSON. I hope that it will do so on Friday.

Mr. CRISP. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The floor leaders of the House have been limiting legislation to certain matters involved in the President's call. When the farm relief bill is disposed of we will have completed practically the program. If the Senate does not agree to a recess resolution, is it the gentleman's intention to have the House adjourn three days at a time, the House transacting no other business, until the Senate has disposed of the tariff bill?

Mr. TILSON. That would be my purpose in case no agreement is reached.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman does not mean to say we have completed the whole program as soon as the conference on the farm relief bill is agreed to?

Mr. TILSON. All except a few little things that must be cleaned up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

BUREAU OF PROHIBITION (H. DOC. NO. 31)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Rules and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In order to secure the utmost expedition in the reorganization and concentration of responsibility in administration of the Federal bureaus connected with prohibition enforcement, so greatly needed to improve their effectiveness, I recommend that the Congress appoint a joint select committee to make an immediate study of these matters and to formulate recommendations for consideration at the next regular session.

I shall be glad to appoint a committee from the departments to cooperate with such a committee of the Congress. The National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement will also cooperate through their studies of the departmental organization.

The subject involves the transfer of parts of various bureaus and agencies from certain departments to others and it includes as well the necessity for the unification and strengthening of our border patrols both in connection with prohibition and illegal entry of aliens. As the question embraces numerous laws and regulations in several bureaus, it will require extensive consideration which if given jointly by such committees of the Congress and the departments prior to the regular session will save many months of delay.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 6, 1929.

TREASURY BILLS

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I present for printing under the rules the conference report upon the bill H. R. 1648, to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1648) to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"(b) All certificates of indebtedness and Treasury bills issued hereunder (after the date upon which this subdivision becomes law) shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation (except estate and inheritance taxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority; and the amount of discount at which Treasury bills are originally sold by the United States shall be considered to be interest within the meaning of this subdivision."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1648) to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House bill increased the tax exemptions of the present law so as to exempt any gain from the sale or other disposition of certificates of indebtedness or Treasury bills, and also denied any loss. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision of the House bill and grants an exemption only as to principal and interest, as under the present law, and adds a provision that the amount of discount at which Treasury bills are originally sold by the United States shall be considered to be interest within the meaning of the subdivision. Although the House bill would result in considerable simplification, would result in interest rates more favorable to the United States, and in the end would very likely not affect the revenues, the Senate took the position that the provision was an entering wedge toward the exemption of capital gains.

Under the present law, when tax-exempt securities are sold at a discount in lieu of interest, any increase in value realized by the original purchaser is tax exempt, but no exemption is granted a subsequent holder. In order to prevent the application of this rule, the Senate amendment provides for the computation of interest at the original discount rate for the period during which the security is held, whether by the original purchaser or any subsequent holder. In other words, the original discount rate at which the security is sold is substituted for the interest rate fixed by the security itself in the case of an interest-bearing obligation. The amount of tax-exempt interest is apportioned among the holders according to the periods of their holdings. Any gain in excess of this amount is taxable and any loss resulting from a sale or other disposition is allowed as a deduction.

The House recedes with an amendment correcting a typographical omission.

W. C. HAWLEY,
ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
ISAAC BACHARACH,
JNO. N. GARNER,
J. W. COLLIER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the conference report on the bill H. R. 1648, and consider the same at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the conference report upon the bill H. R. 1648 and consider the same at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will reserve a little time, because I want to make a short statement in respect to it. I have no objection to its present consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may we have the conference report read before the objection stage is passed?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that the consideration of this conference will not pass thereby the unanimous-consent stage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk is reporting it now for information.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, again reserving the right to object, I see another gentleman standing here with a unanimous-consent request. I have a unanimous-consent request. I have no objection to the consideration of the report, but I do not want the stage for unanimous-consent requests to be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize both gentlemen at the proper time. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the conference report.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, the Senate amendment proposes to change the original proposal of the House by making taxable gains arising out of transactions in these proposed Treasury bills. That is the extent of the amendment. It proposes to make taxable gains arising out of transactions in Treasury bills. If anyone buys these bills and makes an excess over the interest or discount provided in the issue, that excess becomes taxable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the original bill as it passed the House, it exempted those gains from taxation.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And this follows more or less the Senate amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. And it amends the Senate amendment by inserting a line omitted in the bill as printed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposal of business on the Speaker's table, I be permitted to address the House for 35 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman should wait until to-morrow to make that request. There is important business pending before the House that we are anxious to take care of. We also have the farm relief bill before us. I wish the gentleman would withdraw his request now and make it again to-morrow.

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. If it would gratify the wishes of the gentleman I will be glad to withdraw my request and repeat it to-morrow.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—FOLLOWING LEADERSHIP

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I rise for a brief moment to call the attention of the House to something which I think is important, inasmuch as it affects the rights of the Members of the House.

On Tuesday evening, as we had completed an arduous day's work in this Chamber, the leader of the majority side rose and said he thought we ought to have some understanding as to the order of business on the next day, and thereupon, because he thought of the convenience of Members, as he stated, he moved that the committee rise. The committee rose, and subsequently we came into the House, and thereupon the leader on the majority side of the House proffered a unanimous-consent request that Calendar Wednesday business be dispensed with in order that we might go on with the census and apportionment bill. Now, my interpretation of that procedure is that it amounted to an agreement between the leaders and the membership of this House as to what would be the procedure on Wednesday.

On Wednesday, when the House convened, after the reading of the Journal, the chairman of the Committee on the Census took his seat at the table over yonder, and the leader of the House, without one word of explanation, moved to adjourn, and, according to the habit by which we follow a leader, we proceeded like so many dumb animals, to adjourn, whereupon the chairman of the Committee on the Census—I do not think he said it to me, but I at least heard him say it—said: "What is all this for?"

I recognize the necessity of leadership, and I submit the leadership of the House recognizes that it is rather a convenient thing to have a following; but I want to suggest to the leadership, if I may, in all humility of spirit, that that is not the proper way to try to lead us, without giving us some slight intimation as to where we are going.

The membership of the House was entitled at that time to a word of explanation. We want to follow, but we want to know why we follow. A word of explanation as to the reason for that action would have been very much appreciated by at least one Member of the House.

I for one take great pride in this House. I resent the phrase "rubber stamp" which is sometimes applied to the House of Representatives.

Mr. WYANT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. Not just now.

I take great pride in the standing of this body, and I wish to suggest to the House that if the House does not wish to deserve the title "rubber stamp," it is incumbent on the Members of the House to be alert in the protection of their rights. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has to-day called our attention to the unwisdom of precipitate action. I should perhaps blame myself for too great willingness to follow under all circumstances. We sometimes put too much confidence in leaders. Leaders sometimes make mistakes. It is our duty to assist them, lest mistakes be made. Some of us are becoming to feel that it is not altogether to our credit to be classed as "inevitably regular." I submit that we ought to be informed by our leaders as to what we are doing and where we are going. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired. Does the gentleman from Connecticut desire recognition?

Mr. TILSON. No, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman from Maine has scolded the House for its action on yesterday. I hope that he is satisfied. I do not see that what he says hurts the House at all. It was entirely within the power of the House not to adjourn if it so desired.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TILSON. No; I have not the floor.

Mr. BEEDY. I do not wish to be put in the position of having scolded the House, but rather to have criticized the leadership for yesterday's tactics.

TOBACCO TESTIMONY OF EMERSON ELA

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for half a minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Emerson Ela, a constituent of mine of prominence, feels aggrieved at a statement made by our colleague Congressman YON with reference to his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee on the tariff on tobacco of a certain kind.

Mr. Ela has wired me to have a statement inserted in the RECORD setting him right. I have conferred with Congressman YON and would like to insert Mr. Ela's letter to Mr. YON in the RECORD, if he does not object. If he should object, then I ask permission to insert the telegram which I have received, which is not offensive, I think, to Congressman YON. May I do so?

Mr. YON. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his own remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin received the consent of the gentleman from Florida to extend his remarks by inserting a certain document, but the Speaker did not put that part of the request. I do not know whether it is necessary or not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is this letter? Is it from some man in the gentleman's district?

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. A prominent man in my district was mentioned by name in the RECORD by Congressman YON. He did not wish, I am sure, to misrepresent him, but he is very greatly grieved at this language of Mr. YON's:

> That the evidence produced by one Mr. Ela as to what he purported to be the wishes of binder and filler growers toward this schedule was not warranted.

He has made a reply in a letter to Congressman YON, but Congressman YON does not want that letter in the RECORD and has objected, but I understand Congressman YON does not object to the telegram going in the RECORD.

Mr. SABATH. Is not this setting a bad precedent?

[Cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. I do not wish to take the time of the House on a personal matter of this kind; but I affirm, on good authority, that Mr. Ela did not misrepresent the binder and filler growers. The board of directors of the Northern Wisconsin Cooperative Tobacco Pool authorized his appearance before the committee. This board consists of 16 growers of tobacco from every part of the tobacco-growing area of Wisconsin, and largely in my district, and I believe that he did speak officially as counsel and attorney for about 5,000 growers of tobacco who belong to this very successful organization.

Moreover, as for Mr. Ela himself, although we have differed politically, I have known him for 30 years, as a regular Republican, civic leader, and prominent attorney at law, and can assure the House that he is a man of such character that he would not misrepresent anything or anybody before a legislative committee or elsewhere.

CENSUS APPORTIONMENT

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate bill 312. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CHINDBLOM, will kindly take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate bill 312, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Tuesday, the last section of the bill had been read and debate upon that section and all amendments thereto had been limited to 10 minutes. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] had offered an amendment, to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] made a point of order. The point of order was pending at the time the committee rose. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. REED of New York. If the Chair pleases.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I suppose I should address the Chair. I would like to have, however, the whole committee hear the discussion because there may be others who will wish to discuss the point of order, if the Chair permits.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I have but a very few minutes and, of course, I realize the temper of the committee at the present time and know you are very impatient and are not anxious to hear a discussion, even on a point of order.

I stand here before you to-day as the unfinished business and I probably will be finished very shortly, so far as this amendment is concerned; but I want the committee to understand just the purpose of this amendment. Prior to 1911——

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I make a point of order against any discussion pertaining to the merits of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The gentleman from New York, however, has not proceeded far enough as yet for the Chair to know what he is laying a foundation for in the matter of an argument on the point of order.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, may we have the point of order stated again?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest, if there is no objection, and in the interest of orderly procedure, that the Clerk be permitted to read the amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, prior to August 8, 1911, the apportionment act of that year, it was always provided in the matter of redistricting that this should be done by the legislature of the State in accordance with Article I, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States, which gives the legislature the power to fix the time and places, but reserves to the Congress the right at any time to make, alter, or amend such regulations. In 1911, in order to take care of a situation in Ohio and in some other States where they had the referendum, they changed this language that had been used for more than half a century to the language that it should be by the laws of the State.

Now, here is the practical situation under the law as it now stands. Unless my amendment is passed you would have this situation: After the enumeration is made it will probably develop in my State that instead of 43 Members of Congress we will have 42, and this means that if there is a deadlock between our legislature and our governor 42 Members of the Congress would have to be elected at large. Every one of them could be nominated in the city of New York, and I am casting no reflection, but these men would not accurately reflect the sentiment of the rural section of the great State touching prohibition, immigration, and other important public questions.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As I heard the amendment read, it provides that the legislature may by concurrent resolution take this action at any time after the approval of this act.

Mr. REED of New York. Yes; at any time after the approval of the act.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This bill is supposed to go into effect, or you desire it to go into effect, during this special session, which would be before the census is taken. Therefore, this proposed amendment would provide that without the governor's signature the legislature could redistrict the State at any time after the signing of this bill and before the census has been reported.

Mr. REED of New York. Something that should have been done nine years ago and has not been done. The legislature should have the right to do it now, if required to insure justice to the people of my State.

I now want to call your attention to the point of order, and I ask you gentlemen, if you have the bill before you, to turn to section 21 of the bill. The point of order has been made that this proposed amendment is not germane and that it does not relate to the subject in any shape or form. Let us see what has happened. I think every one of you has an interest in this question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the gentleman addressing his argument on the point of order to the House or to the chairman of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, it is being addressed to the Chair and the Chair is hearing the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It seemed to me the gentleman was making an argument to the House rather than to the Chair, and I did not think the House ought to pass on the question at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is following the gentleman, both with respect to the present bill and the law to which the gentleman is referring.

Mr. REED of New York. I realize that the point of order is not well taken. I just hope the House will be patient with me. I do not think you need to feel any particular alarm about what may happen when I get through, but I just want to call your attention to a very important and practical question touching representation.

I want you to read the last sentence in section 21:

That the act entitled "An act to provide for the fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses," approved March 3, 1919, and all other laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

This was never intended to be in the present bill. This was in the Senate bill. They never changed it. Perhaps, under a strict construction by the courts they would not have to change it, but it leaves it open to considerable doubt, because the language is "all other laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed," and this includes section 22.

It happens that if it is construed in this way it means that sections 3, 4, and 5 of the apportionment act of August 8, 1911, which provides as follows:

That in each State entitled under this apportionment to more than one Representative, the Representatives to the Sixty-third and each subsequent Congress shall be elected by districts composed of a contiguous and compact territory, and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants. The said districts shall be equal to the number of Representatives to which such State may be entitled in Congress, no district electing more than one Representative.

SEC. 4. That in case of an increase in the number of Representatives in any State under this apportionment such additional Representative or Representatives shall be elected by the State at large and the other Representatives by the districts now prescribed by law until such State shall be redistricted in the manner provided by the laws thereof and in accordance with the rules enumerated in section 3 of this act; and if there be no change in the number of Representatives from a State the Representatives thereof shall be elected from the districts now prescribed by law until such State shall be redistricted as herein prescribed——

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Does the gentleman from New York think that sections 3 and 4 in the 1911 act are really inconsistent with the present act?

Mr. REED of New York. They are now the law and what I am pointing out to the House is that under section 21 of this bill there is a possible construction by which they may be repealed, and we will go out to the country with an apportionment act that leaves it absolutely free to the legislature to put in shoestring districts, saddleback districts, and achieve all the vicious things of the gerrymanders in the days of old.

Mr. CROWTHER. Does not the language in the present bill call attention to the sections that are inconsistent, and I ask the gentleman again whether he considers sections 3 and 4 inconsistent?

Mr. REED of New York. I say there is that possible construction.

Mr. CROWTHER. Oh, possible construction!

Mr. REED of New York. I will say this, that when we pass an act we should make it as clear as possible, and not leave anything to conjecture.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I do not desire to cut the gentleman from New York off, but he has conceded the point of order made by the gentleman from New York. He is not discussing the point of order. He is not addressing the Chair. If he desires to be heard further, I think it should be by unanimous consent, because it is not in accordance with the provisions of the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken with this exception, that notwithstanding the concession of the point of order by the gentleman from New York that it may be well taken, he then proceeded to claim that the repeal of certain provisions of the prior law might make his amendment in order. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. REED of New York. I want to say that inasmuch as this bill may be passed repealing the provisions to which I have referred, my amendment proposes to save the situation by making it possible to prevent a deadlock in the legislature. I will yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear from the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself for a moment to the point of order. I have in mind the provision to which the gentleman from New York has referred, namely, the language of section 21, but I take a different point of view as to the effect of the pending bill upon sections 3, 4, and 5 of the act of 1911.

What does the pending bill provide? It provides, first, for taking the census; and, second, it provides for an apportionment of Representatives in Congress. The measure carries language, to which the gentleman from New York has referred in section 21, providing for the repeal of certain specific laws and any other law inconsistent with the pending bill. Evidently the pending bill provides for the repeal of section 1 of the act of August 8, 1911. It unquestionably provides for such repeal. I do not think that it provides directly or indirectly for the repeal of other sections of the act.

Now, if that is true, it would seem that the remaining provisions of the act of 1911 ought to be subject to amendment. That is precisely what is proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The act of August 8, 1911, provides for two contingencies in the districting of the different States. One is that in event the representation in the different States should not be disturbed by the census of 1910 and the State legislatures do not undertake to redistrict, then the act itself would provide that the districting in existence at the time of the passage of the act shall continue. The other contingency provided for was in States that would receive additional representation in Congress. The act provides that in such contingency if the States fail to redistrict the number of Representatives gained by the States over that which they already had would be elected at large.

In the pending bill you are providing a third contingency not referred to in the act of 1911, namely, the situation that would arise should some States suffer reduced representation. Should any State, as a result of the census and apportionment we are providing for, suffer a reduction in representation, then in the absence of laws in the States providing for new arrangements of districts there would be no provision whatever for election of Representatives in Congress from such States.

So, then, it would seem reasonable that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is in point and that it is germane to a portion of an act that we are not repealing, though we are repealing part of such act.

So, bringing the matter to a head, I submit that the pending bill provides for the repeal of section 1 of the act of August 8, 1911, as this section is in conflict with definite provisions of the pending bill, but it does not provide for the repeal of sections 2, 3, 4, and 5. If that is true, it seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from New York is germane.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. I want to call the Chair's attention to a different phase of the subject. We are operating at the present moment under unusual and extraordinary conditions by reason of the fact that the committee which would ordinarily have had jurisdiction of the bill has not been appointed by the House, and therefore the bill is now before the House and the Committee of the Whole under a special rule, never having been considered by a committee.

The rules of the House which would ordinarily guide the Chair in deciding the germaneness of this amendment can not be applied, because the rules of the House contemplate that every bill which comes from the Senate goes through the ordinary legislative channels of the House, one of which is to be referred to a committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter, and from that committee reported to the House and from the House considered in the Committee of the Whole. That is not the fact here. Therefore, the Chair can not approach this question under the ordinary rules or precedents of the House established when we have committees and a committee has considered the bill. The Chairman in this instance is exactly in the same position that a chairman of a committee would be. If this amendment were offered in the Census Committee and the point of order were made, clearly the chairman of that committee would hold that it is germane, that it is related, that it does pertain to the subject matter of the bill, and would hold it in order. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole in this instance is in exactly that position, because the Committee of the Whole is acting in the capacity of a House committee considering a bill in the first instance. We have no Census Committee functioning. It was therefore necessary to bring in a special rule setting aside all the rules of the House in order to bring this bill properly before the House and for consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Whatever might have been the jurisdiction of a House committee in framing a House bill, as I understand it, a House committee, if there had been one to consider this bill, would have been subject to the same rules as to germaneness that the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] now is. That being true, I can not see that the fact that we have no House Committee on the Census makes any difference in this question whatever. The rule of germaneness is the same as to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] as it would have been if the House Committee on the Census had reported the same amendment to a Senate bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, in reply to that, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] knows, and surely the present occupant of the chair knows, that there is more latitude allowed in amendments to perfect a bill coming from the other body in a House committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter than there is on amendments offered by Members on the floor of the House, and I say to the gentleman from Michigan that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] would have been germane in the committee because it relates directly to the subject matter covered by section 21 and to the whole purpose and scope of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. With reference to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] the Chair will say that in the view which the Chair takes of the present situation there is no difference in the application of the rules of the House in regard to the subject of germaneness by reason of the fact that this bill has not been considered by the standing committees of the House. The Chair thinks that the effect of the special rule adopted by the House for the consideration of this bill was merely to bring the bill before the House without the intervention of the action of a standing committee, and, of course, in contravention of the ordinary rules of the House. In that connection the Chair is very distinctly of the opinion that all amendments, whether made by a standing committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter to either a House bill or a Senate bill or offered on the floor of the Committee of the Whole, are equally subject to the rule of germaneness.

On Tuesday last the Chair ruled upon this same amendment when offered at another point, and stated that there is nothing in the present bill which relates to the subject matter of the amendment, which subject matter is the action of State legislatures and of State authorities in redistricting a State upon the basis of a reapportionment of Members of the House made by Congress. No argument has been made to-day which controverts the position which the Chair took at that time. The Chair takes it that no one now is prepared to claim that there is anything in the bill pending before us—S. 312—which directly relates to the matter of the redistricting of the States.

However, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] now claims that the provision in section 21 is applicable, which reads as follows:

That the act entitled "An act to provide for the fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses," approved March 3, 1919, and all other laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The gentleman from New York calls attention to that provision and claims that that relates to certain sections of the act of August 8, 1911, which bore on the subject of redistricting by the States, but it seems to the Chair that the gentleman overlooked the effect of the words—all other laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

If there is nothing in this bill relating to redistricting, then there can be nothing in it which is inconsistent with the act of 1911 on that subject. There can be no repeal by this bill of any law or parts of laws which are not inconsistent with that act on the subject of redistricting by State legislatures.

Furthermore, the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] stated that in his opinion section 1 of the act of August 8, 1911, is repealed by the words which the Chair has just quoted in section 21 of the pending bill; but he said that sections 2, 3, and 4 are not so repealed. If they are not repealed, of course they are not affected by S. 312, now before us; and if section 1 is the only one that is affected, the only one that is repealed, it seems to the Chair that the gentleman's argument is without avail.

In addition, the Chair calls attention to the language of the act of August 8, 1911, in section 4:

That in case of an increase in the number of Representatives in any State under this apportionment, such additional Representative or Representatives shall be elected—

And so forth. And to the language in section 3:

That in each State entitled under this apportionment to more than one Representative—

And so forth.

All the way through every provision of the act of August 8, 1911, relates to "this apportionment"; that is, the apportionment provided for in the act of August 8, 1911.

Therefore, it seems to the Chair very clearly that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] is not germane to the pending bill; and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word. Upon that he is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. How much debate is left on this section?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. DYER. It is understood that five minutes will be left after the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] has consumed his five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, on June 3, 1929, when S. 312, a bill to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress, was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I served notice that at the proper time I would offer the following amendment:

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prevent the legislature of any State (subject, however, to the initiative and referendum law in any State wherein such a law exists), at any time after the approval of this act, in order to secure contiguous and compact territory and equalization of population in accordance with the rules enumerated in section 3 of the apportionment act, approved August 8, 1911, by concurrent resolution, redistricting the State for the purpose of electing Representatives to Congress, and upon each and every such redistricting the Representatives to Congress shall in any such State be elected from the new districts so formed.

It is my opinion that this amendment would be quite unnecessary were it not for the fact that the apportionment act of 1911 changed the language usually found in the reapportionment acts. Prior to 1911 the authority to redistrict was specifically delegated to the legislatures of the States, but in the apportionment act of 1911, to meet the referendum situation in Ohio, the authority to redistrict was given in this language: "In the manner provided by the laws thereof."

The amendment which I am offering does not disturb the referendum laws of any State but it places the authority to redistrict where it belongs—with the legislatures of the States. I want to call the attention of the House to the language of Article I, section 4, of the Constitution:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

I want to refresh the recollection of the Members of the House by explaining that at the very time the convention was considering Article I, section 4, and using the word "legislature" the members of that convention had fresh in their memory the unpopularity of the royal governors because of their abuses of the veto power. The bitterness of the people toward the arbitrary abuse of this power by the royal governors must have produced some reaction upon those who were using the word "legislature" in a document which sought to protect the liberties of the people. Not only this, it is significant in considering the use of the word "legislature" in this section and in other sections of the Constitution to keep in mind that only three States—Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and New York—had seen fit to grant the veto power to their governors.

Let me put it another way: At the very time that the convention was considering the word "legislature" the legislatures alone in eight States were concerned in enacting statutes. Surely in view of these facts the framers of the Constitution, in providing that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof," never contemplated that the governor's approval would be required to give force and effect to such action as any State legislature might take in the premises.

The meaning of the term "legislature" as used in the United States Constitution has been construed by the courts. Let me quote from the Supreme Court:

What did the framers of the Constitution mean in requiring ratification by "legislatures"? That was not a term of uncertain meaning when incorporated into the Constitution. What it meant when adopted it still means for the purpose of interpretation. A legislature was then the representative body which made the laws of the people.

The term is often used in the Constitution with this evident meaning.

Article I, section 2, prescribes the qualifications of electors of Congressmen as those "requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature."

Article I, section 3, provided that Senators shall be chosen in each State by the legislature thereof, and this was the method of choosing Senators until the adoption of the seventeenth amendment, which made provision for the election of Senators by vote of the people, the electors to have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

In Article IV the United States is required to protect every State against domestic violence upon application of the legislature, or of the executive when the legislature can not be convened.

Article VI requires the members of the several legislatures to be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States.

By Article I, section 8, Congress is given exclusive jurisdiction over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be.

Article IV, section 3, provides that no new States shall be carved out of old States without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned.

There can be no question that the framers of the Constitution clearly understood and carefully used the terms in which that instrument referred to the legislature of the States. (Hawke v. Smith, 253 U. S. 221.)

The purpose of an apportionment act is to apportion or allocate among the several States the entire representative power of all the people in the Union according to their respective numbers. The bill (S. 312) provides for the whole number of which the House of Representatives is to be composed, viz, 435 Members, and a method is then provided to ascertain how much of this representative power each State is entitled to, based upon its population.

The representative power of all the people in the Union and its proper allocation to the several States, as directed by the Constitution, goes to the very root of free government. It was sought by those who framed the Constitution to distribute this power of all the States on the basis of the population of the several States, and to that end they directed an enumeration be made every 10 years.

Article I, section 2, clause 3 of the United States Constitution provides that—

> The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of 10 years, in such manner as they shall direct.

In obedience to this constitutional mandate the Congress has provided by legislation for a decennial census and a reapportionment of congressional representation from 1790 to 1910. It is now nine years since the 1920 census was taken, and although the House has performed its constitutional duty by passing a reapportionment act, the Senate has failed to act until the first session of the Seventy-first Congress. This deadlock has broken a precedent of legislative regularity and obedience to a constitutional mandate covering a period of 120 years.

The present bill (S. 312) seeks to anticipate a similar legislative situation on the subject of apportionment and by its provisions prevent a future legislative deadlock on this subject, the provisions to become operative, however, only in the event that the Congress fails to act. The remedial provision to which I refer is section 22 of S. 312, as follows:

> SEC. 22. That on the first day, or within one week thereafter, of the second regular session of the Seventy-first Congress and of each fifth Congress thereafter, the President shall transmit to the Congress a statement showing the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed, as ascertained under the fifteenth and each subsequent decennial census of the population, and the number of Representatives to which each State would be entitled under an apportionment of the existing number of Representatives made in the following manner: By apportioning the existing number of Representatives among the several States according to the respective numbers of the several States as ascertained under such census, by the method used in the last preceding apportionment and also by the method of equal proportions, no State to receive less than one Member.
> If the Congress to which the statement required by this section is transmitted fails to enact a law apportioning Representatives among the several States, then each State shall be entitled, in the second succeeding Congress and in each Congress thereafter until such apportioning law shall be enacted or a subsequent statement shall be submitted as herein provided, to the number of Representatives shown in the statement based upon the method used at the last preceding apportionment; and it shall be the duty of the Clerk of the last House of Representatives forthwith to send to the executive of each State a certificate of the number of Representatives to which such State is entitled under this section. In case of a vacancy in the office of Clerk, or of his absence or inability to discharge this duty, then such duty shall devolve upon the officer who, under section 32 or 33 of the Revised Statutes, is charged with the preparation of the roll of Representatives elect.
> This section shall have no force and effect in respect of the apportionment to be made under any decennial census unless the statement required by this section in respect of such census is transmitted to the Congress within the time prescribed in this section.

There is another situation that may arise to cause a miscarriage of justice with respect to the reapportionment of Representatives among the States. Provision is made in S. 312 to prevent a deadlock between the House and the Senate with respect to apportionment legislation, but no provision is made in the Senate bill to prevent a possible deadlock in the States when the legislature attempts to redistrict. Let us take New York State as an illustration of what may happen. It is predicted that under the reapportionment based upon the 1930 census New York State may and probably will lose a Representative. A deadlock between the legislature and the executive might prevent a redistricting of the State. This, if it should occur, would require that all of the Members, 42 in number, be elected at large. This would be manifestly unfair to the people of the State and the Nation.

The whole principle of representative government, as disclosed by the debates of the framers of the Constitution, was to make it possible for the various interests, such as agriculture, industry, finance, commerce, navigation, to have a voice in the national councils. Congress recognized the fact in 1842 that this could best be accomplished by providing for congressional districts composed of contiguous territory which would enable a Representative to be known to his constituents, and he in turn to be familiar with the conditions in that district, so that he could legislate intelligently and effectively. The selection and election of the 42 Representatives at large, without due regard to the agricultural, industrial, financial, and other interests of the State, would deprive a large portion of the State from any voice in the national councils. It is to avoid any such calamity as this that I am urging this amendment.

This situation I wish to meet by offering the following amendment:

> SEC. 23. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prevent the legislature of any State (subject, however, to the initiative and referendum law in any State wherein such a law exists), at any time after the approval of this act, in order to secure contiguous and compact territory and equalization of population in accordance with the rules enumerated in section 3 of the apportionment act, approved August 8, 1911, by concurrent resolution, redistricting the State for the purpose of electing Representatives to Congress, and upon each and every such redistricting the Representatives to Congress shall in any such State be elected from the new districts so formed.

This brings us to a consideration of the scope of the power of Congress in this matter of reapportionment of Representatives. As clearly stated in the case of Prigg v. Pennsylvania (1842, 16 Pet. 619), while there is no express power in the Constitution authorizing Congress to reapportion, the whole purpose of the enumeration, as provided for in the Constitution, would be nullified if the means to accomplish the ends were denied to Congress:

> Although the Constitution has declared that Representatives shall be apportioned among the States according to their respective * * * numbers, and for this purpose it has expressly authorized Congress by law to provide for an enumeration of the population every 10 years, yet the power to apportion Representatives after this enumeration is made is nowhere found among the express powers given to Congress, but it has always been acted upon as irresistibly flowing from the duty positively enjoined by the Constitution.

Following is Article I, section 4, of the United States Constitution:

> Control of congressional elections.—I. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators.

This constitutional provision was adopted on Thursday, August 9, 1787. The debate shows clearly that the purpose the framers of the Constitution had in mind was to keep sufficient control of the election of Representatives to prevent any State legislature from obstructing or interfering with the orderly and equitable apportionment of the representative power of the people.

> The Committee of Detail had provided in its report that—
> "The times and places and manner of holding the election of the Members of each House shall be prescribed by the legislature of each State; but their provisions concerning them may, at any time, be altered by the Legislature of the United States."
>
> Madison and G. Morris thought that this provision ought at least to be confined to election of Members of the House of Representatives; since, as to the Senate, the right of the legislatures to elect Members of that body must necessarily include the right to regulate the times, places, and manner of election. The convention, however, did not concur with his view. Charles Pinckney and Rutledge moved to reject the power of Congress to alter the provisions made by the States; Madison, Gorham, King, and G. Morris contended that such a power was absolutely necessary, for, as Madison said:
>
> "The necessity of a general government supposes that State legislatures will sometimes fail or refuse to consult the common interest at the expense of their local constituency or prejudices * * *. The legislatures of the States ought not to have the uncontrolled right of regulating the times, places, and manner of holding elections. These are words of great latitude. It was impossible to foresee all the abuses that might be made of the discretionary power * * *. It seemed as improper in principle * * * to give over the election of the Representatives of the people in the General Legislature as it would be to give to the latter a like power over the election of their representatives in the State legislatures."
> The convention supported Madison's view.
> Read, of Delaware, then suggested an amendment to vest in Congress the power not only to alter the provisions of the States but to make regulations in case the States should fail or refuse altogether, and this was adopted.—The Making of a Constitution, by Charles Warren.

More than a quarter of a century after the adoption of Article I, section 4, of the Constitution William Rawle, discussing this provision in his work on the United States Constitution, had this to say:

> It only remains to observe that to guard against a refractory disposition, should it ever arise in legislatures of the States, in respect to times, places, and the manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, Congress is empowered at any time to make or alter by law such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators.

Kent, commenting on Article I, section 4, in his Commentaries, in connection with the apportionment act of 1842, which for the first time provided that Representatives should be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory * * * said:

This direction [referring to election by districts composed of contiguous territory] was authorized by the provision in the Constitution (Art. I, sec. 4) that the time, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Continuing, Kent expressed the reason and the wisdom of the legislation:

The election of Members of Congress by districts had been heretofore adopted in some of the States and not in others. Uniformity on this subject was desirable, and the measure itself was recommended by the wisdom and justice of giving, as far as possible, to local subdivisions of the people of each State a due influence in the choice of Representatives, so far as not to leave the aggregate minority of the people in a State, through approaching perhaps to a majority, to be wholly overpowered by the combined action of the numerical majority, without any voice whatsoever in the national councils.

THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO REDISTRICT

An examination of the reapportionment acts from 1790 until the act of 1842 shows that nothing was said about laying out congressional districts. The power to do so, however, was delegated to Congress in section 4 of Article I of the Constitution.

The history of apportionment legislation and the power of Congress to delegate authority to the States to redistrict was carefully compiled by a distinguished former Member of this House, Hon. Marion E. Rhodes, a Representative from Missouri. The brief is as follows:

BRIEF OF HON. MARION E. RHODES, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF MISSOURI, ON THE QUESTION OF THE RIGHT OF CONGRESS UNDER THE CONSTITUTION TO DELEGATE TO THE STATES AUTHORITY TO REDISTRICT

Section 2, Article I, of the Constitution, provides that Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers.

Section 2, Article I, of the Constitution, also provides that the actual enumeration of inhabitants of the United States shall be made within three years after the first meeting of Congress, under the Constitution, and within every subsequent period of 10 years in such manner as Congress shall direct. This same section 2 provides that the number of Representatives shall not exceed 1 for every 30,000. This is all the constitutional authority there is on the subject of taking the census and fixing the basis of representation in Congress, except what appears in section 2 of the fourteenth amendment, and from 1790 down to the present time Congress has in various acts, but not always in the same way, provided for taking the census once in 10 years and fixing by law the basis of representation.

It is clear under the provisions of section 2, Article I, of the Constitution, that the object of taking the census was for the purpose of apportioning direct taxes and Representatives in Congress among the several States. Inasmuch as the census is to be taken once within each period of 10 years, it is also clear this requirement was put into the Constitution in order to equitably apportion Representatives in Congress among the several States and to provide for an increase in the number of Representatives in Congress, from time to time, as the population might increase.

Following the decennial census of 1790, Congress passed its first apportionment act, effective April 14, 1792. This was a very brief act, consisting of but one short paragraph, conforming to the requirements of the Constitution above mentioned. All Members of Congress under this act were evidently elected at large, because there is no reference therein to the question of congressional districts. The act provided for one Representative in each State for every 33,000 persons, determined according to section 2 of Article I of the Constitution. (1 Stat. L. 253.)

Following the census of 1800, effective January 14, 1802, Congress passed the second apportionment act, providing for one Representative in Congress for every 33,000 persons in each State, determined according to the Constitution. This act, like the preceding, consisted of but one short paragraph and made no reference to the election of Members of Congress by congressional districts. In fact, it was a verbatim copy of the act of 1792. (2 Stat. L. 128.)

Following the census of 1810, by act of Congress effective December 21, 1811, the third apportionment act was passed. The only difference in this act and the two preceding acts was that the ratio was changed to one Member for every 35,000 persons in each State, determined according to the Constitution. (2 Stat. L. 669.)

Following the census of 1820, by act of Congress effective March 7, 1822, Congress passed its fourth apportionment act, which was substantially the same as those preceding, except the basis of representation was fixed at one Representative for every 40,000 persons in each State, determined according to the Constitution, no reference being made in this act to the question of congressional districts. (3 Stat. L. 651.)

Following the census of 1830, by act of Congress effective May 22, 1832, Congress passed its fifth apportionment act, which was substantially the same as each of the preceding acts, except the basis of representation was increased from one Member for every 40,000 persons to one Member for every 47,000 persons, to be determined according to the Constitution, no reference being made to congressional districts. (4 Stat. L. 516.)

Following the census of 1840, by act of Congress effective June 25, 1842, Congress passed its sixth apportionment act, fixing the ratio at one Representative for every 70,683 persons in each State having a fraction greater than one moiety of the said ratio. This act consists of two paragraphs, the first being substantially the same as in the preceding apportionment acts, except the basis of representation is increased. Section 2 provides as follows: "That in every case where a State is entitled to more than one Representative in Congress the number shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory equal in number to the number of Representatives to which such State may be entitled, no one district to be entitled to more than one Representative." This is the first time in the history of apportionment legislation any reference is made to congressional districts. Members of Congress having been prior to this time either elected at large in the several States or elected by districts fixed by the several States independent of congressional action. In most cases, however, they were elected at large. (5 Stat. L. 491.)

By act of Congress effective May 23, 1850, provision was made for taking the seventh decennial census. In this act Congress authorized the Secretary of the Interior to apportion Representatives in Congress among the several States and fixed the number of Members at 233. This act provided for electing one Representative at large for each major fraction of the ratio. This act also provided for taking of the census by the United States marshals of the several States. This is the first time in the history of our Government (and I think the only time) that Congress provided for taking the census and determining the representation in Congress in the same act. Under the provisions of this act the Secretary of the Interior was not only directed to apportion Representatives in Congress among the several States, but he was also directed to certify the result to the House of Representatives and to the governors of the several States. (9 Stat. L. 433.)

However, supplementary to this act, Congress passed an act, effective July 30, 1852, directing the Secretary of the Interior to enforce the provisions of the above-mentioned act. It appears the census returns from the State of California were incomplete, which had resulted in delay on the part of the Secretary of the Interior in complying with the law. The act further provided for an increase of the total membership, previously fixed at 233, to 234. (10 Stat. L. 25.)

By act of Congress, approved March 4, 1862, it was provided "that from and after the 3d day of March, 1863, the number of Members of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States shall be 241; and the eight additional Members shall be assigned one each to Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Vermont, and Rhode Island." This act was silent as to the question of laying States out into congressional districts. (12 Stat. L. 353.)

By act of Congress, approved February 2, 1872, Congress fixed the number of Representatives at 283 Members, to be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants. Under this act provision was made for electing Members at large in the States in which an increased number of Representatives had been given under the law, providing that the other Representatives to which the State was entitled should be elected by districts then provided for until the legislature of said State might otherwise provide before the time fixed by law for the election of such Representatives. This act also fixed the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, beginning with the year 1876, as the day for electing Representatives and Delegates in Congress. This act also provided a method of filling vacancies on account of death or resignation in Congress. Section 6 of the act provided for the enforcement of the fourteenth article of amendment. (17 Stat. L. 28.)

By act of Congress approved February 25, 1882, the House of Representatives was to be composed of 325 Members, there being no reference to the ratio of representation. Section 3 of the act provided that Representatives should be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory and each containing, as nearly as practicable, an equal number of inhabitants. The conclusion of this section follows in the nature of an amendment: "That unless the legislature of such State shall otherwise provide before the election of such Representatives shall take place as provided by law, where no change shall be hereby made in the representation of a State, Representatives thereof to the Forty-eighth Congress shall be elected therein as now prescribed by law. If the number as hereby provided for shall be larger than it was before this change, then the additional Representative or Representatives allowed to said

State under this apportionment may be elected by the States at large, and the other Representatives to which the State is entitled by the districts as now prescribed by law in said State; and if the number hereby provided for shall in any State be less than it was before the change hereby made, then the whole number to such State hereby provided for shall be elected at large unless the legislature of said State has provided or shall otherwise provide before the time fixed by law for the next election of Representatives therein." (22 Stat. L. 5.)

By act of Congress, approved February 7, 1891, the number of Representatives was fixed at 356 Members, apportioned among the several States according to the provisions of this act, without reference to the ratio of representation as in the preceding reapportionment act. This act also provided for the election of Representatives by districts composed of contiguous territory and containing, as nearly as practicable, an equal number of inhabitants. Section 4 of the act, which is very similar to section 3 of the preceding act, is as follows: "That in case of an increase in the number of Representatives which may be given to any State under this apportionment, such additional Representative or Representatives shall be elected by the State at large, and the other Representatives by the districts now prescribed by law, until the legislature of such State, in the manner herein prescribed, shall redistrict such State; and if there be no increase in the number of Representatives for the State, the Representatives thereof shall be elected from the districts now prescribed by law until such State be redistricted as herein prescribed by the legislature of said State." (26 Stat. L. 735.)

Following the census of 1900, by act of Congress approved January 16, 1901, the number of Representatives was fixed at 386 Members, apportioned among the several States as in the two preceding acts without reference to the ratio. This act contained substantially the same provision, both with regard to laying out the States into congressional districts and electing Representatives at large. Section 4, however, contains this provision: "If the number hereby provided for shall in any State be less than it was before the change hereby made, then the whole number in such State hereby provided for shall be elected at large, unless the legislatures of the said States have provided or shall otherwise provide before the time fixed by law for the next election of Representatives therein." (31 Stat. L. 733.)

Following the census of 1910, by act of Congress approved August 8, 1911, the number of Representatives was fixed at 433 Members without reference to ratio. This act contains the same provisions with regard to the method of electing Members of Congress and laying States out into congressional districts composed of contiguous territory as in the act of 1901. Under section 4 of this act the same provision was enacted in relation to electing Members at large as in the preceding reapportionment act, except no provision was made for electing Members at large on account of a reduction of membership, because under this act no State lost a Member. This act contained an additional section relating to the method of nominating candidates for Congress at large. (37 Stat. L. 13.)

Under the apportionment act of February 25, 1882, Maine and a few other States each lost a Member of Congress. This act provided specifically for the election of Members of Congress at large, in the event a State lost representation, until such time as the legislature might redistrict the same. While the reapportionment act of January 16, 1901, contained the same provision concerning the election of Members of Congress at large, in the event a State lost membership, as was provided in the act of February 25, 1882, yet under this act no State lost membership. It will be observed from the foregoing history of reapportionment legislation that Congress did not exercise its power, under the Constitution, in directing the several States in the formation of congressional districts during the first 50 years of our national life. In other words, the States were left free to either elect Members of Congress at large or to elect them from local congressional districts of their own making.

Reviewing the history of congressional elections, it is found that in a vast majority of cases Members of Congress were elected at large in all the States prior to 1842. In that year, however, Congress for the first time provided that in every case where a State was entitled to more than one Representative in Congress, the number to which such State was entitled should be elected by congressional districts composed of contiguous territory, equal in number to the number of Representatives to which such State was entitled according to the provisions of the act.

In the reapportionment act of February 2, 1872, Congress not only provided that congressional districts should be composed of contiguous territory, but that such districts should be composed as nearly as practicable of equal population. From that day to this, in every reapportionment act, Congress has provided that the several States should be laid out into congressional districts composed of contiguous territory and of equal population.

Under the apportionment act of May 23, 1850, Congress delegated authority to the Secretary of the Interior to reapportion Representatives in Congress according to the census herein provided for, and to certify the result to the House of Representatives and to the governors of the several States.

It is clear from the above-cited cases that Congress from time to time could just as easily have provided that the governors of States might lay out the States into congressional districts as for the legislatures to have done so, because it is from the reapportionment act itself the States derive their authority to lay out congressional districts, and not from the Federal Constitution. Hence, Congress can delegate such authority either to the legislatures or to the governors of the several States.

As this question of reapportionment following each decennial census will arise to plague others who have not had to deal with this legislation, I have attempted to throw as much light as my limited ability will permit on this question. An interesting sidelight is thrown on Article I, section 4, of the Constitution, which will be found in Elliot's Debates, volume 1, page 361. A letter by "Cornelius" in the Hampshire Gazette (Mass.), December 11, 18, 1787, expressed the fear that this section of the Constitution be used to injure the rural districts. The letter reads:

> This power being vested in the Congress may enable them from time to time to throw the elections into such particular parts of the several States where the disposition of the people shall appear to be the most subservient to the wishes and views of that humble body * * * should it so happen (as it probably will) that the major part of the Members of Congress should be elected in and near the seaport towns, there would in that case naturally arise strong inducements for fixing the places for holding elections in such towns within their vicinity. This would effectually exclude the distant parts of the several States and the bulk of the landed interest from an equal share in that Government in which they are deeply interested.

Now, after 140 years, the effects of Article I, section 4, of the Constitution, so much feared because it was then thought that it might favor the large cities at the expense of the rural sections, can be invoked to protect the rural districts from urban domination in the choice of Representatives.

Without the adoption of the amendment which I have offered making clear the power of the legislature to redistrict, the entire representative power of the State of New York may be thrown into the cities. On the other hand, the entire representative power might be thrown into the rural portions of the State. In either event a very large portion of the population of the State would be without representation as contemplated by the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, and ask that it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TILSON: Page 16, beginning with line 21, strike out all of section 22, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"SEC. 22. (a) On the first day, or within one week thereafter, of the second regular session of the Seventy-first Congress and of each fifth Congress thereafter, the President shall transmit to the Congress a statement showing the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed, as ascertained under the fifteenth and each subsequent decennial census of the population, and the number of Representatives to which each State would be entitled under an apportionment of the then existing number of Representatives made in each of the following manners:

"(1) By apportioning the then existing number of Representatives among the several States according to the respective numbers of the several States as ascertained under such census, by the method used in the last preceding apportionment, no State to receive less than one Member;

"(2) By apportioning the then existing number of Representatives among the several States according to the respective numbers of the several States as ascertained under such census, by the method known as the method of major fractions, no State to receive less than one Member; and

"(3) By apportioning the then existing number of Representatives among the several States according to the respective numbers of the several States as ascertained under such census, by the method known as the method of equal proportions, no State to receive less than one Member.

"(b) If the Congress to which the statement required by subdivision (a) of this section is transmitted, fails to enact a law apportioning Representatives among the several States, then each State shall be entitled, in the second succeeding Congress and in each Congress thereafter until the taking effect of a reapportionment under this act or subsequent statute, to the number of Representatives shown in the statement based upon the method used in the last preceding apportionment. It shall be the duty of the Clerk of the last House of Representatives forthwith to send to the executive of each State a certificate of the number of Representatives to which such State is entitled under this section. In case of a vacancy in the office of Clerk, or of his absence or inability to discharge this duty, then such duty shall devolve upon the officer who, under section 32 or 33 of the Revised Statutes, is charged with the preparation of the roll of Representatives elect.

"(c) This section shall have no force and effect in respect of the apportionment to be made under any decennial census unless the statement required by subdivision (a) of this section in respect of such census is transmitted to the Congress within the time prescribed in subdivision (a)."

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi reserves a point of order.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, there is no point of order to be made against this amendment.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves a point of order.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DICKINSON. Do I understand there is only five minutes left for debate on this section?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. TILSON. I do not yield any time for it.

Mr. DICKINSON. The gentleman has not been recognized yet for debate, only for offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has not been recognized. The amendment has been offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, and to it the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] have reserved points of order. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I prefer not to yield. I am willing to yield for a parliamentary inquiry, but it must not be taken out of my time. I insist that the point of order should be passed upon.

The CHAIRMAN. Only five minutes remain of debate on this section.

Mr. TILSON. Again I insist that the point of order be passed upon.

Mr. STAFFORD. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order would be the disposition of the point of order. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to argue the point of order?

Mr. TILSON. It is perfectly clear that the amendment is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Connecticut a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I demand to know whether the point of order is made or reserved. I demand the regular order.

Mr. WINGO. I will make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is so meticulous. The gentleman will have to come back here 40 years from now to keep me from asking these questions under the rules.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was perfectly conscious of what I was doing when I made the point of order.

Mr. WINGO. I apologize to the gentleman. I thought he was unconscious.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was just as alive and just as awake as the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. RANKIN. I reserved a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has reserved a point of order. Does the gentleman make it? Does the gentleman from Massachusetts make it? The Chair thinks he should say to the gentleman from Arkansas that the Chair should make the inquiry first.

Mr. WINGO. I want to ask the gentleman from Connecticut about his amendment. Some gentlemen call for the regular order when they do not know what it is.

Mr. SNELL. When the regular order is demanded and the Member reserves a point of order, he must make it.

Mr. TILSON. My amendment is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. WINGO. I thought at first that the gentleman from Connecticut was saying that unconsciously, but he has given us his word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts on the point of order.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, this motion contravenes a well-known rule of parliamentary procedure in this House, namely, that no legislation can be effected by indirection that can not be effected by direction.

On the day before yesterday amendments were adopted to section 22 which are now sought to be stricken out. The method is indirect, supervenes and sets aside the action of this committee. This is a subterfuge, without authority and without precedent. [Cries of "Rule!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. WINGO. Is the Chair going to rule it out of order? If he is, I want to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman care to be heard?

Mr. WINGO. Is the Chair familiar with the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is familiar with the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. It does nothing under the sun except to eliminate two amendments that the committee has already adopted. Is not that true?—and I submit that as a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that is not a parliamentary inquiry, but the Chair will state that in his opinion there is more in the amendment than that.

Mr. WINGO. There are two rulings here. Champ Clark, when he was Speaker, overruled me in a well-considered opinion when I tried to do the same thing that the gentleman from Connecticut is doing. Let us be candid about it. You are proposing to come in here, after the committee has adopted two amendments to the section, and do by indirection that which you can not do by direction. You have changed one word here and there, but you are restating the substantial part of section 22 and leaving out the two amendments which the committee has already acted upon; in other words, you reconsider the vote by which the committee adopted the Hoch amendment and the Tinkham amendment. The gentleman from Connecticut and some gentlemen upon the Democratic side are in, if I were parliamentarily permitted to say so, a "hell of a fix," but that does not mean you have the right to override parliamentary law in order to pull them out of the hole. There is a way to get at this, in keeping with parliamentary precedents, and I protest seriously and with all the force I can against this subterfuge in overriding the rules of the House by attempting to do by indirection that which you can not do by direction. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do. I am opposed to the point of order. It is well established here that when a section is under consideration and a motion is made to strike it out that motions which are made to amend the text are in order and precede the motion to strike out. You can then go ahead and add a lot of amendments to the section; then the motion to strike out comes up and wipes the whole thing out, and that is what is proposed to be done here. Then there is nothing in the rules which prevents this House from turning around and inserting something in the place of that which is stricken out. [Applause.]

Mr. DOWELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. DOWELL. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. DOWELL. Day before yesterday two amendments were adopted to this section, the Hoch alien amendment and the Tinkham amendment, and this section has just now been restated in this amendment, omitting these amendments. As I understand from the reading of this amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut he is seeking now to strike out the two amendments referred to. Under the rules of the House these amendments having been adopted in the Committee of the Whole a few days ago, he must go to the House to have the House pass upon them. He seeks to strike them out by this amendment. That is what it means. This amendment, interpreted as it should be correctly interpreted, would mean to strike out the two amendments that have been adopted by this committee, and I maintain this is contrary to the parliamentary rules, and it never has been done in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from North Dakota briefly.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, there is just one suggestion that I want to make in addition to the one already made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL], and particularly in reply to the suggestion made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]. Of course, it is true that all amendments proposed to any section and adopted are in the nature of perfecting amendments and that after they have been adopted it is perfectly in order to move to strike out the entire section. If that were the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, I take it the point of order would not have been raised, but that was not the motion.

The motion of the gentleman from Connecticut was to strike out all of the section and then reinstate substantially—not word for word, it is true—but to reinstate substantially the original section carried in this bill plus two or three committee amendments that have been adopted and are in the sections at the present time. Until something can be said which would show that the amendment is substantially different from the original language of this section, together with the minor committee amendments not in dispute, then this amendment accomplishes exactly what the gentleman from Massachusetts said to do by indirection what can not be done directly.

It seems to me the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I should like to submit a parliamentary inquiry. If the Chair should hold the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] to be in order, would it then be in order to offer the Hoch amendment to the Tilson amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would not wish to answer that in advance. That will raise questions of germaneness and questions of the time for opening it to amendment.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Would the Chair hold that the fact that this amendment in effect wiped out the perfecting amendments previously adopted by the committee would preclude such perfecting amendments from again being offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the time is ripe for answering that question.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Of course, if the substitute offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] is adopted in the Committee of the Whole, that ends the so-called Tinkham amendment and the Hoch amendment, and the question I desire to propound to the Chair is this: If the substitute is defeated and both amendments stay in the bill, would not any Member of the House, when it comes from the Committee of the Whole, have the right to demand a separate vote on every amendment adopted in the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be for the Speaker of the House to pass upon, but the present occupant of the chair would rather think that any Member may ask for a separate vote.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule unless the parliamentary inquiry relates to the matter of procedure.

Mr. GREEN. It does, Mr. Chairman. In the event the amendment is adopted, then it will be in order, will it not, for the minority to move to recommit and insert the Hoch amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. No motion to recommit can be made in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GREEN. I know that; but will not that motion to recommit be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair has examined the amendment and compared it with the text of section 22 and finds a considerable number of changes in form and to some extent in substance, which, in the opinion of the Chair, would make the amendment in order.

The only question, it seems to the Chair, that might remain to be determined would be whether the fact that this proposed substitute omits some of the amendments already adopted by the committee has any bearing, and upon that question the Chair has a very complete and distinguished precedent and authority which is within the recollection of the present occupant of the chair. It occurred on June 28, 1922. The Committee of the Whole had before it a bill relating to certain land offices and amendments had been adopted eliminating certain such offices and adding others, when the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Mann—recognized, I think, by all of us as one of the greatest parliamentarians and legislators in the history of this body—offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute which struck out everything after the enacting clause and inserted in lieu thereof the original bill as amended by amendments offered on behalf of the standing committee, but eliminated an amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], which had been adopted in the Committee of the Whole, and had materially changed the principal section of the bill. Mr. Mann stated frankly that his purpose was "to give the committee an opportunity to practically pass upon this same question again, but in a parliamentary way and one that is in order." Mr. Mann stated that if the House should adopt the French amendment he was afraid that no opportunity would be afforded for voting on some of the committee amendments. As a matter of fact, the French amendment, which had been adopted by the committee, itself struck out some of the committee amendments which had previously been approved by the Committee of the Whole.

A point of order was made to the substitute by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] and he argued it very ably. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole at the time was the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Towner, now the Governor of Porto Rico. After much discussion the Chairman, Mr. Towner, said:

> The Chair is ready to rule. There are two methods by which substitutes for the entire bill may be offered. The first is to offer, after the first paragraph has been read, a substitute for the entire bill, with the notice that with regard to the succeeding sections of the bill, as they are read, a motion will be made to strike them out. That method has been used in a good many instances. In that case gentlemen will notice that, of course, there is no opportunity for amending any subsequent section of the bill, providing the substitute is agreed to.
> The other method is to offer the substitute for the entire bill at the conclusion of the reading of the entire bill, as was done in this instance by the gentleman from Illinois. Of course, in that case all of the amendments that have been adopted by the committee, whatever they may be, are stricken out if the substitute is adopted. If the substitute contains in effect or in actual language some of the amendments that are already agreed to, that does not deprive the mover of the substitute of the consideration of his substitute. That applies practically to the case that we have before us, in the opinion of the Chair. No matter what the effect of this substitute may be, it is the right of the committee to vote down or to support the motion of the gentleman from Illinois. The point of order is, therefore, overruled.

While the decision of the Chair in that instance related to a substitute for an entire bill, in the pending case the substitute relates to an entire section and proposes a substitute for that section, and in this particular case, as the Chair has already observed in rulings upon section 1—and this may become important hereafter—this bill is composed of two parts. Sections 1 to 21 relate entirely to the taking of the census. Section 22 relates entirely to the apportionment of the Members of the House among the States. So that, to all intents and purposes, section 22 is a bill all by itself; in fact, it is well known that in the Senate the census bill and the reapportionment bill were consolidated and section 22 is practically the reapportionment bill which this House passed in January of this year.

Therefore the Chair is constrained to the conclusion that the question now before the Chair is practically on all fours with the case decided by Chairman Towner in 1922, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, there is no need for extended debate on this provision, because all the matters it contains have been debated for several days. The amendment introduces no new matter except some clarifying provisions in section 22 of the Senate bill.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. DICKINSON. A great many Members of the House do not realize, however, that if they vote for this substitute there will be no opportunity whatever to vote on either the Hoch amendment or the Tinkham amendment in the House of Representatives, and if this amendment is defeated in the House the language of the original bill is restored in the legislation.

Mr. TILSON. I think the membership of the House understands perfectly, but I shall spend a few moments in explaining it.

There is no need to dodge the question. The principal thing it does is to eliminate the two provisions that were put into the bill the other day. [Applause.] That is the effect, frankly stated, and that is the object of it.

Mr. GARBER of Oklahoma. To what provisions does the gentleman refer?

Mr. TILSON. I refer to the Hoch amendment and to the Tinkham amendment.

Mr. GARBER of Oklahoma. This amendment would preclude any vote on the Hoch and Tinkham amendments.

Mr. TILSON. The adoption of this amendment strikes out section 22 and substitutes new language. The new language does not embody either the Hoch amendment or the Tinkham amendment, but it does embody the clarifying amendments put in by the Committee of the Whole House the other day. The whole point of it is that if this amendment is carried it makes possible a census and reapportionment bill. I think it would be most unfortunate if this extra session of the House should take a recess without having passed a census bill and an apportionment bill. [Applause.] And this is the only way we can secure the passage of a census bill and an apportionment bill.

I hope that the Members on both sides—as this is not strictly a party question—that the Members on both sides will lay aside petty differences on immaterial things and let us pass through the House a census bill and an apportionment bill, a duty which we have too long delayed. [Applause.]

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Is it not true that both of these amendments are on highly controverted matters and do not belong in the bill?

Mr. TILSON. They ought both to be treated in separate bills where they can be considered on their merits. I do not believe in bringing in here and attaching to this bill matters that do not belong to it.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Would not the adoption of your amendment be in effect an admission on the part of the House that it is unable to legislate and feels that a special committee appointed by the Speaker can better legislate on this subject than the House itself?

Mr. TILSON. It would be a clear demonstration that the House is able to legislate. That is the object of bringing this amendment before you. [Applause.]

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Connecticut by adding it at the end of the Tilson amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the Tilson amendment insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"The word 'persons' as used in this section shall not be construed to include aliens. If any provision of this section is declared unconstitutional the validity of the remainder of the act shall not be affected thereby."

Mr. TILSON. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that it is not germane.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. HOCH. I certainly do desire to discuss the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to criticize the distinguished leader, for whom I have an affectionate regard. I did not particularly find fault for his action yesterday which was disturbing to many Members because he had a disturbing situation to meet. But I do object if any strong-arm methods are to be used to prevent the House from passing on this proposition.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all time has expired.

Mr. HOCH. I shall address myself directly to the question of germaneness.

Mr. TILSON. I object to the gentleman's statement as to strong-arm methods.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that up to the present moment the gentleman from Kansas has not discussed the point of order. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I will discuss the point of order. The question is as to the germaneness of the amendment. What is this amendment? It provides an interpretation of a word which has been used in the very section. Can anyone say that to interpret a word which has been used in the section is not a germane amendment? If that is not germane, I do not know what in the world could be germane. We have used the word "persons" in this section, and my amendment simply provides that the word "persons" as we intend it to be used here shall not be construed to include aliens. If that is not germane, I ask my good friend from Connecticut, what is germane? Is it not germane to interpret a word which you have just used in the language which precedes my amendment?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the interpretation of a word which the gentleman seeks to inject into the section is such an interpretation as to entirely change the meaning of the word, then his amendment is not necessarily germane.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman is addressing his remarks to what he conceives to be the logic of the matter. I do not agree with him on that.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, my suggestion was absolutely with reference to the question of germaneness.

Mr. HOCH. Let me proceed for a moment upon the question of germaneness.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. On the point of order strictly. The amendment we are now considering is a substitute offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] for the original section 22 of the bill. Under the rules a germane amendment is in order to a substitute. This substitute is practically the same as section 22 of the bill. When we were considering section 22 this identical amendment was offered and was held germane and adopted by the committee.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, no point of order was made against it, although a point of order should have been made.

Mr. CRISP. Whether a point of order was made or not, the House by not making it acquiesced in it.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman from Georgia is undoubtedly correct on that point. This language is already in section 22, which the House has passed on; but getting to the other question, Mr. Chairman, I want to address myself to one other suggestion that was made upon the question of germaneness. The suggestion has been made that this adds another class, that the language in the bill says "excluding aliens," and that you can not add another class. Suppose instead of the word "persons" we had used these words, "all male citizens, all female citizens, all male aliens, all female aliens." Does anyone mean to suggest that it would have been out of order, not germane, to strike out two of those classes? When we strike out simply one class, even proceeding on that phase of the argument, we certainly have not done a thing which has ever been held not to be germane. I submit that the House ought to be permitted to pass directly on this issue, and if we are beaten we are willing to take our medicine without complaint and get ready for another day. The opponents should be willing to do the same.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in support of the point of order.

The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] refers not to the persons to be counted, but adds to the class of people to be excluded. The exclusion in the amendment now before the House refers to but one class, namely, Indians not taxed. There is a long line of precedents in the House holding that where a provision in a section of a bill refers to one class or one type, an amendment adding to that class is not germane. One individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. My amendment is to the substitute of the gentleman from Connecticut, and the language is not in that substitute at all.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The language of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut provides:

The whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.

That is in the amendment. The exclusion refers to one class, and under a long line of precedents an amendment to add to the one class is not germane. Of course, if the Chair should rule that this is in order, two classes being included, then, certainly, the Tinkham amendment is in order. [Applause.] But we are confronted now with the proposition that you have an exclusion of but one class, and the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas refers to that one class, and the point of order should be sustained. Just one precedent is necessary to sustain this point of order. It is exactly in line and to the point. Speaker Cannon held on January 8, 1904, an amendment to a bill providing for the eradication of boll weevil, adding gipsy moth not germane, and sustained a point of order. That decision is sound, has been followed innumerable times, and is binding on the Chair

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Has the point of order been specifically made upon the ground of germaneness?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood it was made upon the ground of germaneness.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If the point of order so far made has been confined to germaneness, I want to add that I make a further point of order upon the ground that this amendment is unconstitutional. It violates the language of the fourteenth amendment, which prescribes that all persons in each State are entitled to be enumerated.

The only exception made is in the case of "Indians not taxed." All other persons in the State must be counted. No other exception is made. If any other exception was intended, it would have been put in the Constitution, either in the fourteenth amendment or elsewhere. No other exception can be found anywhere in the Constitution as it is written. If it is sought to add another exception, it must be incorporated in the Constitution and not slipped into a statute.

Section 2 of the fourteenth amendment is precise and explicit. It reads:

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.

The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] arrogantly assumes to limit the meaning of the word "persons" as used in the Constitution. It does not help his case or disguise his purpose by using in his amendment the words "persons as used in this section" (of the bill), because the term "persons" as used in the section sought to be amended must necessarily be used in the sense in which it is employed in the Constitution. You can not amend or alter the intent of the language of the Constitution in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. CANNON rose. [Cries of "Rule!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be very glad to hear from the gentleman from Missouri, a distinguished parliamentarian.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I remember more than a dozen years ago the minority leader—at that time sitting on the other side of the House—making the statement that the facility with which parliamentary propositions were analyzed was determined not by a knowledge of the rules but by the application of that knowledge. That statement applies with particular force to the argument just advanced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. He is correct in his citation of the rule providing that one individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition of the same class. There is such a rule. But that rule is not applicable to the pending point of order. The proposed amendment is not upon a subject different from that under consideration. On the contrary, it is a part of the subject under consideration. What is the subject under consideration? It is "persons"—all persons, male and female, white and black, naturalized and unnaturalized, alien and American. The amendment deals with only one of those classes, the aliens. And the proposition of the amendment is to remove that class from the other classes of "persons."

Therefore the rule which applies here is the rule under which any part of a subject under consideration can be restricted, limited, or eliminated by amendment. [Cries of "Vote"!]

Mr. Chairman, I would like to digress for a moment to address a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair. I would like to inquire if it is in order for Members sitting in their seats to demand a vote while a colleague has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. CANNON. It is thoughtlessness on the part of Members, of course, but it is both discourteous and out of order. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the rule governing the situation presented by the point of order is the rule that any part of the subject matter under consideration can be removed by amendment. And any amendment to eliminate any portion of the subject matter under discussion is germane. It is known as the doctrine of limitation and is established by a long line of decisions uniform in character and on all fours with the case at bar.

For example, in 1919, when the bill for the termination of Federal control of railways was under consideration, the clerk read the section providing that the Interstate Commerce Commission should determine rates and should have the power to change rates. An amendment was offered providing that while the Interstate Commerce Commission could change rates, it could not change them upward. It limited the power sought to be conferred on the commission—that is, it limited the subject matter under discussion. The point of order was made that the amendment was not germane, and the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Walsh, the only Member to be formally elected Speaker pro tempore by the House in the last 25 years, held that it was a mere limitation; that it limited the subject matter under consideration, and was therefore in order.

Going back to the Democratic régime, in the Sixty-fifth Congress, during the consideration of the bill to establish a Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the proposition before the House was to insure all American ships, of all classes and character. An amendment was offered to exclude from the ships eligible to insurance under the bill all ships which charged exorbitant rates; and the Chairman of the committee held that that was simply a limitation; that it only took from the subject before the House a portion of the subject matter proposed to be affected, and was therefore germane and in order.

In 1923, coming down to more recent times within the memory of all of us, we were considering a bill for the regulation of radio communication. The proposition before the House included all radio communication, both interstate and intrastate. The gentleman from Texas, Mr. Blanton, offered an amendment excluding from the operation of the bill all intrastate radio communication. A point of order was made that it was not germane, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], whom I welcome back to the House most heartily, not only because of his great ability but especially because of his profound knowledge of the law of the House, was sitting as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. In a well-considered opinion, which ranks as one of the important precedents of the House, he held that the proposed amendment to exclude intrastate communication merely took from the subject matter before the House a portion of a subject matter already under consideration, and was therefore germane and in order.

At the risk of being somewhat tedious I shall take the time to cite just a few more decisions on this point.

This is an important question and an important decision, and the law is so well established and the decisions so clear that it is only necessary to call attention to them.

In 1921 the House was considering a bill to establish the Veterans' Bureau. We had before us the Senate bill which excluded from participation in the benefits of that legislation all alien soldiers. My friend from Indiana, Mr. HICKEY, proposed an amendment exempting from the inhibition those aliens who had served honestly and faithfully. A point of order against the amendment was made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], but the chairman held that those aliens sought to be exempted from the operation of the section constituted a part only of those aliens comprising the subject matter under consideration and the amendment was therefore germane.

Another bill was before us in the Sixty-sixth Congress, a bill to extend the operation of the emergency tariff law, which was in effect at that time and which automatically expired unless revitalized by statute.

The bill proposed to continue in effect all tariff rates of the old law. In other words, the subject matter under consideration embraced every rate at that time in force. Mr. NEWTON, of Minnesota, offered an amendment to except one of those rates—the rate on flaxseed.

Our distinguished Speaker, Mr. LONGWORTH, of Ohio, at that time a member of the committee, made the point of order that it was not germane, and Mr. BURTON, of Ohio, now a Senator from that State, who was presiding as Chairman on that occasion, ruled that the proposition to exclude one of the rates merely limited the subject before the House, the House having before it the entire schedules in the tariff bill, and overruled the point of order.

Permit me to refer to just one more case. The House was considering in the Committee of the Whole a bill to deport aliens convicted of crime. An amendment was offered to exclude from the operation of the bill all aliens whose property had been seized by the Alien Property Custodian and whose property rights were then in process of adjudication. Mr. Towner, the Chairman of the committee, now Governor General of one of our insular possessions, held that the subject before the House was the deportation of all aliens convicted of crime and the proposition to exempt those awaiting litigation simply proposed to remove one class of the general subject under consideration. And he properly held the amendment to be germane and in order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us apply this doctrine of limitation to the case before the House.

The subject under consideration is "the whole number of persons"—all persons, without limitation, restriction, or reservation whatever. That is the proposition before the House. What does the amendment refer to? Is it a different subject from that under consideration? Most assuredly not. On the contrary, it is a part of the subject matter already under consideration. It is one class of "the whole number of persons." Who can deny that in consideration of "the whole number of persons" you are thereby and simultaneously considering all aliens in that "whole number of persons"? The amendment is merely a limitation, and as such it is undoubtedly germane and is unquestionably in order. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the Chair hear me for one minute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman from Missouri states that the object of the amendment is to exclude from consideration a certain portion of the subject matter of this paragraph, but it does not do that. It includes in the paragraph all persons, but it adds to one single class that is treated separately another class to be treated separately, and there is no subject matter excluded.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, let us see just what this section does. This section provides for the securing of the whole number of persons in each State. That is the purpose of this amendment, the whole number of persons. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas is an interpretation of the word "persons" in this section, telling who these persons are that are to be counted in each State. It seems to me there can be no question that the amendment excluding aliens from those being counted, as designated in this section, is entirely in order, and I can see no reason whatever why it should not be held in order.

The gentleman from New York suggested cases where a territory was being offered as a State and that the addition of others was not in order. This case is not to be compared with those in any way, because this is merely a definition of the word "persons" when it comes to counting the number of persons in a State and provides that aliens shall not be counted. I think there is no question of its being in order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard just a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] is, it seems to me, an attempt, deliberately, to enact legislation in direct contradiction of the express command of the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.] The Constitution requires that Representatives in Congress shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. "Counting the whole number of persons, excluding only Indians not taxed." That is the language of the Constitution. But the pending amendment provides that the word "persons" in the bill shall not be construed to include aliens.

Mr. Chairman, for a thousand years the word "person" has never had but one meaning, and that is a human being. The word "alien" and the word "citizen" each denotes simply a political status, and the word "person" includes both the citizen and the alien, because both are human beings. The rule of constitutional interpretation is that words are to be considered as having been used in their ordinary meaning. Here is what Webster gives as the correct definition of the word "person," and this agrees with the definition in every other dictionary:

> Person. A living, self-conscious being as distinct from an animal or a thing; a human being; a man, woman, or child.

Thus the Constitution, in requiring the counting of the whole number of persons, excluding Indians not taxed, plainly requires the counting of all men, women, and children, excluding only Indians not taxed.

Now, is an amendment in order which proposes by statute to attempt to destroy the long-established, well-understood, and only proper meaning of the vitally important word "persons" in the Constitution of the United States? It would seem to me that anything which seeks to override the plain, unambiguous mandate of the Constitution of the United States is not in order, and that is exactly what the pending amendment does.

Now, I want to read one more thing, and that is the statement made the other day by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH]. You will find it on page 2362 of the RECORD. In discussing his amendment he said:

> It is true that when the Constitution was framed the word "persons" would have been construed at that time to include aliens.

Well, if "persons" included aliens when the Constitution was framed, it includes them now. It has been held to include aliens for more than a hundred years—always, to this day. Never has there been a census taken without the enumeration of aliens. What, I ask, as a matter of ordinary logic and common sense, and remembering our oaths to support the Constitution of the United States, what has happened that would justify us in voting for this amendment proposing to change the meaning of the word "persons" as it was used by the men who framed the Constitution and as admitted by the gentleman from Kansas? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. With reference to the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] is violative of the Constitution, the Chair is of the opinion that the Chair can not pass upon the question of constitutionality in determining a point of order. (Chairman TILSON, November 27, 1922.) The constitutionality of a legislative proposal is not properly submitted for a ruling by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and as to that phase of it the Chair overrules the point of order.

Reference has been made to the fact that this amendment was offered on Tuesday to the original text and that it was then permitted to be adopted without the intervention of a point of order. Of course, the fact that no point of order was made can not affect the decision of the Chair at this time. Neither was a point of order made Tuesday upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. The Chair is of the opinion that both of these amendments are of the same character, of the same class, and subject to the same rules with reference to germaneness.

The Chair will, therefore, since there is a precedent directly in point, refer to the action heretofore had upon the so-called Tinkham amendment. The Chair might say first that it has been argued that the proposal of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] is merely a definition. The Chair will read a portion of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. It says:

> SEC. 22 (a). That on the first day, or within one week thereafter, of the second regular session of the Seventy-first Congress and of each fifth Congress thereafter the President shall transmit to the Congress a statement showing the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed, as ascertained under the fifteenth and each subsequent decennial census of the population.

The language of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas is this:

> The word "persons" as used in this section shall not be construed to include aliens.

In other words, the gentleman might as well have said the word "persons" as used in this section shall be construed to exclude aliens.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, the Chair has stated——

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

I merely want to suggest this correction to the Chair: The Chairman stated there was no point of order made against the Tinkham amendment when it was offered the first time. I made a point of order against the amendment, and the present occupant of the chair overruled it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is very glad to differentiate. The Chair thought he did differentiate that situation a moment ago. The first portion of this bill relates to the taking of the census. Section 1 provides that a census of population, agriculture, irrigation, drainage, distribution, unemployment, radio sets, and mines shall be taken by the Director of the Census in the year 1929 and every 10 years thereafter.

There are half a dozen or more different subjects that shall be included in the taking of the census and included in the enumeration and the statistical data which are provided by the census. Of course, when offered to that kind of language any amendment almost is in order, and the Chair held that the Tinkham amendment was then in order as adding another subject to a large number already named for the taking of the census. Upon reflection, however, it now occurs to the Chair that there was no point of order made on the Tinkham amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; there was, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was made on the Bankhead amendment with reference to aliens.

Mr. RANKIN. No; I made a point of order on the Tinkham amendment the first time it was offered.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to page 2348 of the RECORD, where the point of order is recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Chair remembers now that the Chair ruled on both of them with reference to the provisions in section 1 in regard to the taking of the census, but we are now considering the matter of reapportionment, section 22, which is entirely a reapportionment measure.

The Chair just referred to the language of the Hoch amendment, "the word 'persons' as used in this section shall not be construed to include aliens." In other words, the effect is that it shall be construed and held to exclude aliens. The language, it seems to the Chair, might just as well have been offered in the form in which it was first offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON] on Tuesday, after the words "Indians not taxed," so as to read "excluding Indians not taxed and aliens."

Of course the amendment now offered and offered on Tuesday by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] contains a further clause to the effect that if any provision of the section is declared unconstitutional, the validity of the remainder of the act shall not be affected thereby, but the Chair thinks every member of the committee will concede that that has no bearing upon the present question.

The Chair, therefore, is constrained to the view that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas is an additional exclusion to that of Indians not taxed of the whole number of persons which shall be transmitted to Congress by the President in the statement which he is required to make in section 22.

The gentleman from Massachusetts offered a similar amendment on Tuesday. This amendment was the subject of consideration in this House on January 9 of this year, 1929. At that time the gentleman from Massachusetts offered an amendment after the words "Indians not taxed" to read as follows:

And inhabitants in each State, being 21 years of age, and citizens of the United States, whose right to vote at an election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, has been denied or abridged except for rebellion or other crime.

This amendment was offered at the same point to which the amendment offered now by the gentleman from Kansas would apply and at the same point to which the amendment offered yesterday by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TINKHAM, would apply. The chairman, who was the present occupant of the chair at that time, in January, sustained a point of order to the amendment and cited an exactly similar case which arose on January 19, 1921, when the House passed an apportionment bill based on the 1920 census.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], diligent then, as now, in trying to secure the adoption of this amendment, at that time offered exactly the same amendment which he offered last Tuesday. The Chair then referred to the argument in the debate upon the point of order by the present Speaker of the House, Mr. LONGWORTH, by the former majority leader, Mr. Mondell, and by the former minority leader, Mr. Garrett of Tennessee, who argued very strongly that the Tinkham amendment was not in order upon the reapportionment bill then pending, which was in practically the same language as the reapportionment section in this bill. The gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Garrett, called attention to the various phases of the rule on germaneness, citing what was then, and is yet, section 778 of the House Manual, and directing particular attention to the principle that one individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition, even though the two belong to the same class; that a specific subject may not be amended by a provision general in nature, even when of the class of the specific subject, and further, that two subjects are not necessarily germane because they are related.

The decision at that time was rendered by the Chairman of the Committee on Rules, Mr. Campbell of Kansas.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] sought to differentiate the present situation from other like situations, and the Chair has in his hand "Cannon's Procedure in the House of Representatives," by the Hon. CLARENCE CANNON, the gentleman from Missouri.

On page 124 the Chair reads. This is the general proposition laid down:

One individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition even though the two may belong to the same class.

The gentleman from Missouri in this splendid manual has collected a large number of cases in which this principle has been applied, and the Chair asks the indulgence of the committee while he cites them.

In a bill admitting a Territory an amendment admitting another Territory was held out of order.

In a bill amending a law in one particular an amendment amending it in another particular was held out of order.

In a bill for the relief of one individual an amendment for similar relief to another individual was held out of order.

In a resolution providing for a special order for a bill an amendment including another bill was held out of order.

In a bill for the extermination of the boll weevil an amendment including the gypsy moth was held out of order.

In a bill prohibiting cotton futures an amendment prohibiting wheat futures was held out of order.

In a bill relative to prison labor an amendment relating to child labor was held out of order.

In a bill providing for an additional judge in one Territory an amendment for additional judges in other Territories was held out of order.

In a bill to increase salaries for one year an amendment to extend the increase to another year was held out of order.

In a bill for relief of dependents of men in the Regular Army an amendment extending the benefits of the act to dependents of men in the National Guard was held out of order.

In a bill for the erection of a statue to General Von Steuben an amendment substituting a statue of Gen. George Washington was held out of order.

In a resolution providing special order for consideration of a bill an amendment substituting another bill was held out of order.

In a bill providing for the sale of Friar lands in the Philippines an amendment including the Crown lands in the Philippines was held out of order.

In a bill providing for vocational rehabilitation in the United States an amendment extending the benefits to Hawaii was held out of order.

And so, the Chair might go on almost without end to show that where a particular proposition is before the committee or the House a second proposition, adding another specific item, is not germane.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Chair permit an interruption just at this point?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The Chair is citing a very eminent authority. [Laughter.] However, the quality of an artisan's product is judged not by the excellence of his tools but by the skill with which he utilizes them. [Laughter.] May I respectfully suggest to the Chair that if he will turn to page 131 he will find the law which applies to this case. The citation quoted does not apply. I would be glad to have the opinion of the Chair on the germaneness of the pending amendment as a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has examined the authorities on page 131, and does not think it necessary to cite cases which apply to different facts and to different situations.

In the pending amendment the general subject matter is "persons," but the Chair will not enter upon a discussion of the meaning of the word "person." That is a general term, and to that there is one single exception, and that one single exception is "Indians not taxed." To that the gentleman from Kansas proposes to add one more exclusion, another exception, namely, "aliens." The Chair does not think it can seriously be contended that the gentleman's amendment is merely a definition. The Chair conceives it to be his duty and the duty of the committee to consider the substance and not the shadow of the amendment. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order. [Applause.]

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the question is: Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee. As many as are in favor of sustaining the decision of the Chair will rise.

Mr. RANKIN (during the count). Mr. Chairman, there will undoubtedly be tellers, and I ask for tellers now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that it is proper to demand tellers in the midst of a vote, but if there is no objection the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I object.

The committee divided; and there were 202 ayes and 129 noes.

So the decision of the Chair was determined to be the judgment of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

The question was taken; and on a division there were 212 ayes and 102 noes.

So the amendment of Mr. TILSON was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the Tilson amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is too late to offer an amendment to the Tilson amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The committee has agreed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is a perfecting amendment to the amendment just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. It should have been offered before it was adopted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I submit the amendment to the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels that the amendment is now out of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Upon what ground?

The CHAIRMAN. On the ground that the proposition to which the amendment is offered has just been agreed to, and has been adopted by the committee as a substitute for section 22 of the bill.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, the committee rises automatically under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the committee will automatically rise.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CHINDBLOM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 312) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress, and he reported the same back to the House, under the rule, with sundry amendments, for the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered. The question is on agreeing to the amendments. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote upon the Bankhead amendment, on page 1 of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any other amendment?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the Dickinson amendment striking out the word "unemployment" in section 1.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote upon the amendment striking out the words "to unemployment," in line 20, page 5, of the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote upon the Tilson amendment to section 22.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I also demand a separate vote upon the similar amendment on page 5, section 4, striking out the words "to unemployment."

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request for a separate vote upon the Tilson amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment on which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DICKINSON: Page 1, line 4, after the word "distribution," strike out the word "unemployment."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 188, nays 189, answered "present" 1, not voting 49, as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Buckbee (for) with Mr. Spearing (against).
Mr. Connolly (for) with Mr. McMillan (against).
Mr. Davenport (for) with Mr. Edwards (against).
Mr. Beck (for) with Mr. Arnold (against).

Mr. McFadden (for) with Mr. Wright (against).
Mr. Griest (for) with Mr. Cox (against).
Mr. Curry (for) with Mr. King (against).
Mr. Welch of California (for) with Mr. Driver (against).

Until further notice:

Mrs. Langley with Mr. Taylor of Colorado.
Mr. Cable with Mr. Lanham.
Mr. Haugen with Mr. Greenwood.
Mr. Leatherwood with Mr. Kvale.
Mr. Welch of Pennsylvania with Mr. McClintic of Oklahoma.
Mr. Summers of Washington with Mr. Hudspeth.
Mr. Ramseyer with Mr. Mansfield.
Mrs. Ruth Pratt with Mr. Underwood.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "aye."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present when his name was called?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. No.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman does not qualify.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 1, line 6, after the period, insert the following:

"In taking such census the Director of the Census shall cause to be registered the names and addresses of all aliens and shall have entered upon such registration a statement by each alien showing by what right or authority of law he had entered the United States."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 130, noes 185.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded. Those who favor taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty Members have arisen, not a sufficient number.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD: Page 5, lines 19 and 20, after the word "distribution," strike out "to unemployment, to radio sets."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, is not that a different amendment. We are now in a different place. It has nothing to do with radio sets. I call for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 210, noes 108.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays. And I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TILSON. What is the parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. This amendment strikes out the words "to unemployment" on page 5. This is simply a perfecting amendment to the other amendment that the House has just adopted.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I suggest that the conferees can take care of that.

Mr. WOOD. The amendment we have just voted on includes not only the words "to unemployment" but also the words "to radio sets."

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. The amendment adopted a while ago referred to unemployment in taking the census next year. Is that correct?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not present when that amendment was offered.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The vote just taken defeats the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] to strike out "to unemployment." Therefore the words "to unemployment" are not now in the bill.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair answer the parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands it, the amendment was defeated. Therefore the words "to unemployment" remain in the first section. This amendment is to strike out the words "to unemployment, to radio sets."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] asked for a separate vote on the amendment to strike out the word "unemployment," on page 1, I called attention to the fact that the word also appeared on page 5. He amended his request to include a separate vote on the amendment on page 5. I think the reporter's notes will show that he asked for a vote on both amendments. I am sure the gentleman from New York made a motion for a separate vote on both amendments. The House, on the roll call, provided that "unemployment" should be kept in the bill, and that vote should apply to both page 1 and page 5.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, the word "unemployment" in the first section remains in the bill. The radio set was stricken out of the bill. I suggest that the matter be left to the conference in order that the conferees may strike out the one and leave the other.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If this word in conference should be stricken out, when they take the census would they take the census of all unemployment?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am not prepared to pass on that.

Mr. GARNER. The object of the House a while ago in reinserting the word "unemployment" was to take a census of unemployment in this country. If it is necessary to defeat this amendment in order to do that, I think the House ought to follow suit and defeat the amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the Chair will permit, it is very clear that the provision in section 4 only amplifies section 1. The House having voted on that and expressed its will to include unemployment, surely the conferees would have to carry out the will of the House.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, evidently the word "unemployment," was stricken out in the Committee of the Whole on this page, because it had been stricken out in the Committee of the Whole on page 1. The word "unemployment" having been reinstated in the House, it seems to me we should by unanimous consent leave the word "unemployment" in section 4 on the fifth page.

Mr. TILSON. Why not let it go to conference?

Mr. DOWELL. It has been settled by a vote of the House; so if the word "unemployment" remains in one place, it should remain in the other. I ask unanimous consent that the word "unemployment" may remain in section 4, in accordance with the amendment reinserting the word "unemployment" on page 1 of the bill.

Mr. TILSON. That ought to go to conference.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, let us have the yeas and nays and find out whether it goes to conference. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to prefer a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER The Chair thinks it is too late to entertain a unanimous-consent request or a parliamentary inquiry, the yeas and nays having been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 191, nays 179, answered "present" 1, not voting 56, as follows:

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the remaining amendment, on which a separate vote was demanded and subsequently withdrawn, be considered as having been agreed to, together with the amendments which were previously agreed to en gros.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the remaining amendment, on which a separate vote was demanded and subsequently withdrawn, be considered as having been agreed to, together with the amendments which were previously agreed to en gros.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what amendments are under consideration?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will relieve the gentleman from Connecticut of any embarrassment and say it is the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut. Is the gentleman now satisfied?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumes the gentleman is opposed to the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. I am.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. Griest with Mr. Kvale.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Speaker, I want to announce that my colleague the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. WOLVERTON, is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote for the bill.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. FENN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1648) entitled "An act to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 15. Concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 1,000 additional copies of the consolidated hearings held before the committee relative to the tariff act of 1929.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 3083. An act to amend subsection (a) of section 26 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended by the settlement of war claims act of 1928, so as to authorize the allocation of the unallocated interest fund in accordance with the records of the Alien Property Custodian.

THE TARIFF BILL

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a statement in regard to the new tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement in regard to the new tariff bill. This tabulation was prepared by the experts of the Tariff Commission; and while it has not yet been officially approved by the commission, I think it will be found substantially correct.

EQUIVALENT AD VALOREM RATES UPON ARTICLES DUTIABLE UNDER H. R. 2667 OR THE TARIFF ACT OF 1922

NOTE.—In calculating the ad valorem rates, transfers from the dutiable list to the free list, or from the free list to the dutiable list, have been taken into consideration. In the sundries schedule, for example, large imports of hides and skins, and leather and shoes made therefrom, previously free but now dutiable under H. R. 2667 at 10 to 20 per cent, have been included. These items materially reduce the ad valorem equivalent duties for the schedule as a whole. The equivalent ad valorem rates of duty of the tariff act of 1922 are based upon import statistics for the calendar year 1928. The ad valorem rates for H. R. 2667 are calculated from the quantity and values of imports for the same year—that is, 1928.

Schedules	H. R. 2667	Tariff act 1922	Increase over act of 1922
Manufactured products: [1]	Per cent	Per cent	Per cent
1. Chemicals, oils and paints	32.37	29.35	10.29
2. Earths, earthenware and glassware	54.88	45.45	20.75
3. Metals and manufactures of	39.46	35.07	12.52
4. Wood and manufactures of	25.40	15.95	59.25
9. Manufactures of cotton	43.58	40.26	8.25
10. Flax, hemp, jute, and manufactures of	18.26	17.61	3.69
11. Manufactures of wool	63.07	53.26	18.42
12. Manufactures of silk	59.40	56.56	5.02
13. Manufactures of rayon	54.55	54.05	.93
14. Papers and books	26.15	24.52	6.65
15. Sundries [2]	28.11	20.40	37.79
Average for manufactured products	35.29	29.78	18.50
Agricultural products: [3]
5. Sugar, molasses, and manufactures of	92.36	67.85	36.12
6. Tobacco and manufactures of	66.96	63.09	6.13
7. Agricultural products and provisions	34.11	23.10	47.66
11. Wool	46.82	42.68	9.70
Average for agricultural products	57.83	43.76	32.15
The following schedule is not included in the above averages: 8. Spirits, wines, and other beverages	43.90	35.89	22.32

[1] Includes in some cases products of mines and forests as well as manufactures of these products.

[2] Included in Schedule 15 are hides and skins, the equivalent ad valorem rates on which are as follows: H. R. 2667, 10 per cent; act of 1922, free. The rates in Schedule 15, exclusive of hides and skins are, in H. R. 2667, 34.53 per cent, and in the act of 1922, 27.63 per cent.

[3] Includes agricultural and marine products and manufactures thereof.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a table and statement given me concerning the tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I wish to call your attention to some of the features of this tariff bill which I believe indefensible and which are in direct conflict with the purposes expressed by President Hoover in calling this special session of Congress for securing some measure of relief for agriculture.

I realize, and I believe every Member of this House realizes, that practically every agricultural section of this country has felt the effects of the discrimination against agriculture which has been practiced in recent years in the formulation of tariff rates. Ever since 1920 the Republican candidates in the agricultural districts have held out their biennial promise to do something to relieve this situation. The Republican Party has had unlimited opportunities to place agriculture upon an equitable basis with industry and manufacture, but has failed to do so; and the measure now before the House is what might be termed merely another political gesture—an effort to evade the national duty to agriculture, a duty which the Republicans of Congress have ignored in former tariff bills and which is ignored in this.

I represent an agricultural district. I know that the farmers of the lower Rio Grande Valley and those of the rest of south Texas whom I represent are entitled to tariff relief. Year after year this relief has been denied them, and it is again denied in this bill. It is true that the rates on some of their products—tomatoes, onions, green beans, potatoes, citrus fruits, wool, and mohair—have been increased. It also is true that the rate on practically every manufactured commodity they are forced to buy has been increased. An analysis of the bill indicates that for every dollar that it may put into the farmer's pocket it will take many more dollars out. And this is the character of tariff relief you are extending them.

You have advanced the rates on cement and other building materials; on clothing, on sugar, on practically every article the farmer is compelled to buy. A study of tariff benefits reveals that very rarely has any agricultural product received the maximum benefit of the rate on that commodity, and that very rarely does a manufactured product fail to receive the maximum benefit. As an illustration, the placing of cement on the dutiable list at 8 cents per 100 pounds signifies that practically every user of cement in the United States will be compelled to pay an increased price for that commodity.

In one section of the fifteenth district—the lower Rio Grande Valley of Texas—famed for its citrus fruits and winter vegetables, grown under irrigation, various irrigation districts have voted bonds in an aggregate amount exceeding $10,000,000 to place concrete linings in their canals or to construct concrete pipe irrigation systems. In that section additional millions of dollars will be expended in the construction of concrete highways over which the growers will transport their products to market. This 8-cent rate on cement is a direct levy upon them.

In that section practically all agricultural products are shipped in wooden containers, for which the cost of the materials will be increased by the rates in this bill, adding thousands of dollars annually to the cost of marketing their products. The increased rates applied to building materials, clothing of every description, greatly adds to their burden.

Agriculture is not organized and its production is not controlled as is the production of manufacture. Competition prevails in all branches of agriculture, and as a result the benefits which will accrue from the increases granted agriculture in this bill will be almost negligible as compared with the profits which will accrue to those manufacturers who control their production and are in position to increase domestic prices to the full height of the tariff wall this bill will erect.

The tomato, potato, and bean growers of the lower Rio Grande Valley, the onion growers of the Laredo section, Winter Garden and Willacy Counties, the sheep and goat raisers, have each received an increase in the tariff rates on their production. But to offset these increases, to which they were entitled, and to preserve for industry and manufacture the privilege of further exploiting these farmers as well as all other American consumers, the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee have reported a bill extending to industry and manufacture rates which are entirely out of line with those granted agriculture.

The bill makes no attempt to bring relief to the farmers of the United States. In no instance does it reflect an honest effort to equalize such benefits as may be secured through application of the protective policy. It is, in my judgment, the most indefensible piece of tariff legislation ever presented in Congress—a travesty, designed to thwart the demands of agriculture and the great mass of American consumers.

While the rates contained in this bill are in direct conflict with the pledges of both the Democratic and Republican Parties, and fail to comply with the expressed purpose of the President in calling this special session of Congress, I do not consider the rates the most vicious feature of the bill. The proposal of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, contained in the administrative provisions of this measure, to surrender to the executive branch of the Government the power of taxation which by the Constitution is reposed in the legislative branch, is unthinkable. With these administrative provisions retained I could not support this bill even if it carried every rate that I would write.

Remember, when the legislative body surrenders its taxing tariff power and its obligations to the Executive you can never recover them except by a two-thirds vote of the House and Senate. When you surrender this power of taxation you surrender it for all time to come or until the two bodies, by a two-thirds vote, can take it away from the Executive.

If an ambitious man is in the White House he will not surrender it. If a wise and patriotic man is in the White House he may have a lack of confidence in the Congress, so neither of them will be willing to give up the power; and in this bill you are forever surrendering to the President of the United States the power to increase or decrease, to the extent of 50 per cent, the rates you are establishing.

In addition to this provision you also have provided a wonderful way of giving the President information. This is about the way it is done: You say to the President of the United State and the Tariff Commission, "You just go out now and pursue this or that policy—I think there are three or four of them—and when you get through, if you do not know anything about it, guess at it and tell them what to do."

There is no definite formula by which they are to ascertain even the value, much less exercise the right of increasing the rate.

There is another feature in the administrative provisions even more vicious. You have in this bill given to the Secretary of the Treasury and his subordinates power to determine by domestic means the value of any imports brought into this country. It is their duty to find out what the value is, but they have the authority, under the provisions of this bill, to ascertain the value by domestic measurements. I believe that provision was written up in the Treasury Department and sent down to the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee for the sole purpose of extending the powers of that department.

This is what you have in this bill: First, you have surrendered your right for an indefinite period to raise or lower the rates, because there will be no occasion for another tariff bill until the American people rebel against the iniquities of this measure, which I believe to be the highest and most inequitable ever imposed upon the statute books. And you make the Secretary of the Treasury the absolute arbiter, and you have taken away from the courts the opportunity of the parties affected going into court and having them review the action of the Treasury Department.

Did you ever have this in any other law? Do you think this is good law? Do you Republicans think if you persuade yourselves you had better surrender your rights in order to let the President put the rates up or down that you also want to surrender the right of the judiciary to function? In one provision you not only surrender the right of one branch of the Government to a second branch, but so far as the Constitution will permit, you destroy the right of the third branch, the judiciary, to function in the matter.

You are delegating to the Secretary of the Treasury, Andy Mellon, the authority to set the values upon which those rates will be applied, and you know what that means. Do you believe that Andrew Mellon or his subordinates in the Treasury Department will have the cause of agriculture and the consumers at heart when they set those values? Would the history of that Pennsylvania Republican machine indicate that they are greatly concerned over the condition of the farmers and that great mass of consumers who for years have been forced by the Republican-made tariff rates to pay tribute to the industrialists and manufacturers who control Pennsylvania politics?

I tell you on my honor that when I approached this question at the beginning of the session and at the hearings I did it with the hope I might vote for this bill. I wanted to vote for it, and every Member of the House knows it. I was anxious to vote for it because I thought the tariff should be taken out of politics; I wanted to get rid of it as a political issue. But the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, not satisfied with having failed to give agriculture equitable tariff rates, have added to the measure these indefensible administrative provisions which will give the tariff barons of the industrial centers the means whereby they may secure still greater concessions and further power in exploiting the American farmers and consumers.

I contend that the Congress, instead of surrendering its powers to the executive branch of the Government, should create in lieu thereof a fact-finding body which would function under the direction of the House and Senate. I have repeatedly stated that it will be impossible to establish tariff making upon a scientific, nonpolitical basis unless such a body is created.

The membership of such a body should be bipartisan, appointed by the House and Senate. Its function would be to investigate tariff rates and to render its reports to the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate. This would make possible the revision of rates to meet changing conditions, the rates to be based upon the investigations of this fact-finding body.

There is no necessity for the legislative branch to surrender its taxing power to the executive branch; there is no necessity for all this cumbersome, awkward machinery set up in the bill now before the House—machinery which is evidently designed to operate only for the benefit of those interests which have been, and which under the provisions of this bill will still be, the principal beneficiaries of our tariff system.

However, the tariff barons and their very able champions here are not in favor of a scientific, nonpolitical tariff. They do not want a fact-finding body, the sole function of which would be to maintain constant investigation of tariff rates. They know that under such system equalization of rates would be inevitable; that the reports of the fact-finding body would be conclusive evidence of the discriminations under the present tariff and the bill the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee have reported, and that in the face of such evidence the Congress would be forced, by the weight of public opinion, to adjust rates upon an equitable basis.

So long as the Republican Party is permitted to build up and maintain this inefficient and one-sided machinery for the administration of the tariff, the tariff barons will prosper and the American farmers and the great mass of consumers will have no recourse.

I had hoped that the Republican leaders, knowing as they do the abuses, the discriminations, the heavy burdens the present tariff has imposed, would be in accord with the program to establish tariff making upon a sound economic basis. I was not prepared for this atrociously vicious administrative provision they have submitted, which, if adopted, will serve only to increase the burden of the many for the benefit of the few. I do not believe the American people expected such action, and I am confident that when they fully realize the viciousness of this provision they will voice their resentment in no uncertain terms.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] recently pointed out some of the most vicious features of the administrative provisions of this bill. He said:

> Having had some experience with the executive branch of the Government I suspected that this proposal did not originate in the Committee on Ways and Means. I suppose it arose in the minds of one of those theoretical economists who had recently been a professor in some college—and they are as full of ideas as a dog is of fleas—who first persuaded the Tariff Commission to do what every other Government bureau does, namely, having acquired power, to reach out for more power. Having persuaded the Tariff Commission, and the Tariff Commission having persuaded the Treasury Department, the Treasury Department then sends the recommendation to the Committee on Ways and Means, and, as an administrative measure, the committee concludes that the greater wisdom of the executive branch of the Government should prevail, and thereupon this provision to transfer almost unlimited power of taxation upon the determination of no precise or tangible facts, but upon a simple economic theory, makes possible the transfer of this almost unprecedented power.
>
> The provision, if adopted by this House, will ultimately be submitted to the Supreme Court of the United States, and I am not prepared to say that the proposed law may not receive the pontifical absolution of that great court, for the very obvious reason that that court from the beginning, as it must be in a democracy, assumes any state of facts, however far-reaching, however far from reality, or any method of reasoning that does not do plain violence to common sense, in order to sustain what it regards as the will of Congress.
> That is the vicious circle in this and many other respects around which we are moving in this country. One individual in an executive bureau conceives that greater powers ought to be given to the executive, and then the appropriate department approves it, and then your committees approve it because the department did, and then the Congress enacts it because the committee approves it, and then the judiciary adds its final sanction out of respect for the legislative will. Ever thus a new innovation in our laws is made a part of our system of government which gravely affects the future of American institutions.

I doubt if any great number of the American people understand these administrative provisions. They understand the rates, but the number who will attempt to analyze the administrative provisions will be comparatively small. They have not received widespread publicity; at least not to the same extent as the rates; but they will know all about these provisions and the menace contained therein before many months after this tariff becomes a law.

The Republican leaders may stifle their consciences by the fact that the people back home are making no vigorous protest against these administrative provisions, but they can rest assured that the time will come when they will hear that protest, and it will be couched in no uncertain terms, a protest which will voice the indignation of an outraged and indignant constituency. So much for the administrative provisions.

I wish to review briefly what the rates in the measure mean to the American farmers and consumers, those who are expecting this Congress to equalize tariff rates and extend to agriculture the same privileges and profits industry and manufacture have enjoyed for years.

According to an estimate by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ESLICK], the new rates will increase the cost of living approximately $700,000,000 annually. He states that out of this the farmer will receive approximately 5 cents of the increase, and the balance, 95 cents, will go to the industrial interests. For every dollar this measure increases the farmer's income it will take from him two to five times that amount, and yet this bill is what the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee have submitted to the House in response to the national demand for an equalized tariff.

Building material, cement, lumber, shingles, brick are taken from the free list and put on the dutiable list with a substantial tariff. Leather and leather goods and shoes are taxed. They were formerly on the free list.

The necessities the farmer must buy have received increases in these rates. Furniture, glassware, earthenware, table and kitchen ware, woolen goods, cotton and rayon cloth, clothing, materials entering into farm implements—even aluminum, in which the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, is so greatly interested—have each received very generous increases at the hands of the Republican framers of this bill.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ESLICK] asserted that this measure will increase the tariff on sugar 64 cents per 100 pounds, or nearly $102,000,000 per year. This would indicate that the American consumers of sugar will be required to pay $385,000,000 each year additional on the sugar they consume. And the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee have the audacity to assert that this is a tariff designed to relieve the farmers. Wheat, corn, and rice are protected, but that tariff is not effective, because we are heavy exporters of those commodities. Cotton is on the free list, yet on a percentage basis we import three times as much cotton as steel. Long-staple cotton should have been placed on the dutiable list, but that would have kept out some of the cheap foreign long staple, and the textile manufacturers would have been compelled to pay the American growers a fair price for the long staple. Consequently the Republican brand of tariff relief for agriculture was again applied and long-staple cotton was kept on the free list.

The advocates of this bill are greatly worried over the condition of labor, stating that it must receive full measure of protection, with which I heartily agree. But I wish to call attention to the fact that the tenant farmer who grows cotton earns for himself and his children an average of 34 cents per day, and the average wage of the industrial worker is $4.95 a day.

Is this equalization of tariff benefits? Is this extending to the farmers of the United States that measure of tariff relief the Republican Party so generously promised prior to the presidential election? Is this in accord with the recommendation of the President that the tariff be adjusted with a view of extending to agriculture the same privileges and benefits which industry has enjoyed for years?

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE] in discussing the bill states that an analysis reveals that the increase on manufactured products averages 25 per cent more than the increase on farm crops. If the farmer were to receive the maximum benefits of the increases granted him, which he will not, due to the fact he is producing a surplus of most of the commodities, he would still be the loser to the extent of 25 cents in the purchasing power of every dollar he receives in exchange for his crops. In view of this fact is there any relief in sight for the farmer if this tariff bill is enacted?

The Republicans now are practicing the same camouflage they used so effectively in 1922, when the Fordney-McCumber bill was under consideration. That bill, the present tariff, was repeatedly referred to as a measure designed to aid American agriculture, and the history of agriculture for the past six years should be sufficient to prove to everyone that it placed an unbearable burden upon the farmers. Mr. Fordney, author of the bill, stated on this floor while the bill was under consideration:

> My friends, as far as rates are concerned, this is purely an agricultural bill, covering the articles described in this bill.

We know what that bill did to agriculture. The evidence is before our eyes to-day. From the lower Rio Grande Valley of Texas to the Canadian line and from Maine to California agriculture has felt the effects of the increases that bill extended to industry and manufacture; and this bill proposes to further extend the power of industry to exploit agriculture.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE] gave an excellent illustration of how the bill now under consideration will further reduce the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar. He called attention to the fact that the farmer will pay 20 cents on every dollar's worth of plows, 35 cents on every dollar's worth of wire nails, 60 cents on every dollar's worth of aluminum ware, $3.50 on a $10 set of work harness, $11.25 on a suit of clothing valued at $20, $2.40 on a wool blanket valued at $3. If he wishes to enjoy hunting during the winter, he will pay $6.70 tariff on a single-barrel shotgun valued at $6, and if he should decide to secure a better gun, he will pay $23.50 tariff on one valued at $30.

Here are a few examples, cited by the gentleman from South Carolina, setting out the articles and the tariff provided in this measure and showing how it will affect the farmers of the United States:

Paint, valued at $5	$3.50
1 ton cement	1.60–14.00
Cups, saucers, etc., $3 value	1.80
Plow, valued at $20	4.00
Nails, valued at $10	3.50
Aluminum ware, valued at $8	4.80
Crosscut saw, valued at $5	1.00
1 set wagon harness, $10	3.50
2 horse collars, $5 each	3.50
Pocketknife, valued at $1	.50
Suit, valued at $20	11.25
10 pair shoes, valued at $5 a pair	10.00
3 hoes, valued at $1 each	.90
Shovel, pitchfork, rake, value $1 each	.90
2 hats for wife, value $4 each	2.00
1 ½-inch wrist watch	2.50
1 doll for child, valued at $1	.90
Tombstone, valued at $100	50.00

These are merely a few of the many items the farmer is compelled to purchase. In fact, an analysis of this bill reveals that regardless of how economical he may be, how modestly he and his family may live, the tariff-protected industries will demand and receive their toll. Even the little child is not exempt from the rapacious greed of those who have waxed prosperous as a result of the discriminations contained in the Republican tariff, and which will be continued if this bill is enacted. The child's doll must be taxed to satisfy that greed for gain which appears to dominate the highly protected interests of the United States.

Under the provisions of this bill the American farmer will be taxed to the extent of $50 to $200 per annum for each member of his family, which in a family of five would run a total of $250 to $1,000 per year. Is there a Member of the House who can honestly assert that he believes the small measure of protection granted agricultural products can to any degree mitigate the burden this tariff places upon the farmers? In view of these facts, I would ask: Upon what grounds can the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee claim that this tariff is designed to relieve agriculture, or in what manner can it prove beneficial to any class within the United States other than those directly engaged in manufacture?

I stated when the tariff bill was reported by the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee on May 9 that from a hurried survey of the rates I was convinced that the bill was decidedly sectional—designed to protect eastern industry and opposed to western and southern industry and agriculture. Further analysis of the bill has served to strengthen this conviction that it is purely sectional. I pointed out at the time the bill was reported that a majority of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee represent that section of the United States east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio River—the great industrial area of the Nation. That they ably represent the major interests of that section is disclosed by the rates contained in this tariff bill, rates which obviously discriminate in favor of the industrial area the majority of the Republican members of the committee represent. The Democratic members of the committee were not permitted to participate in the formulation of these rates. We were excluded, the Republican members intimating they would be responsible for the bill and that they would employ their own peculiar methods to arrive at what they term equitable rates.

The South is not the only section against which this bill discriminates. Throughout the Northwest, the so-called "granary of the United States," the farmers are vigorously protesting against its unfair provisions. Their indignation was expressed by the following open telegram, which was recently forwarded to Hon. REED SMOOT, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. The signers of that telegram are residents of Minnesota and the two Dakotas. The telegram follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., May 27, 1929.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
Chairman Senate Finance Committee,
Washington, D. C.:

We, business men and farmers of the agricultural Northwest, had certain definite promises from the Republican Party and the Republican candidate for President last fall in the present tariff bill, especially in regard to the proposed tariff on the farmer's building material and the lack of sufficient increases in the tariffs on what the farmer has to sell. We see a failure of the Republican Party to keep those promises so solemnly made.

We understand quite distinctly that the present special session of Congress was called primarily and exclusively to help the farmer. The tariff was to be amended to the interests of the farmer. Yet we find what we consider wholly unjustifiable increases in the tariffs on the farmer's building material. The sum total of the farmer's trouble, as everyone knows, is the spread between the cost of that which he buys and the prices of that which he sells. Instead of narrowing the spread, the tariff on shingles, lumber, fence posts, brick, cement only increases it. The farmer is the country's chief user of shingles. Any increase in the cost of shingles will come largely out of the farmer's pocket. The farmer is probably the sole user of fence posts. The farmer must pay the increased cost of these. The farmer is a large user of cement; he uses cement in the construction of his farm buildings, for fence posts, and pays his share of the cost of cement roads.

The cement industry is one of the most highly organized in the country and is organized chiefly in the interests of the industry. We can not understand that this industry needs help at the expense of the already distressed farmer.

With due appreciation of the labors of your committee we can not see how these proposed increases square with the campaign pledges of the Republican Party and of the President. We earnestly urge that all building material in which the farmer is chiefly interested be put on the free list. We also urge increases in duties on agricultural imports such as are advocated by the northwest Congressmen. We feel that we have a right to ask this in good faith in view of the promises made to us during the last campaign.

The Minneapolis Tribune, the great conservative newspaper of the Northwest, voices the indignation of the farmers of that section in the following editorial:

A WARNING TO THE INDUSTRIAL EAST

The fight now being waged over the tariff focuses attention upon the antagonistic elements within the Republican Party.

Agriculture is asking that the tariff be so readjusted that it confer upon the western farmer the same benefits that in the past it has conferred upon the eastern industrialist. This is what agriculture was promised by the Republican Party in the last campaign. Mr. Hoover declared that if elected President he would devote his energies to the achievement of that objective. That he spoke with sincerity is beyond dispute. He called a special session of Congress for the purpose of fulfilling his and the party's pledges. Yet now, with the session fairly well advanced, it becomes apparent that agriculture is not getting what was promised it, and that the farmer is winning advantages as a seller only by forfeiting advantages as a buyer.

What force within the Republican Party is it that is persistently thwarting agriculture?

The first answer to that is that it is not President Hoover.

And the second answer is that it is mainly the industrial East.

Who opposes agriculture on casein? Chiefly the industrial East. Who opposes agriculture on vegetable oils and fats? The industrial East. Who opposes agriculture on butter? The industrial East. Who seeks to impose higher cement costs on the farmer? The industrial East. Who seeks to turn the present farm relief session into a session designed to increase the farmer's all-round living costs? The industrial East. Who seeks to repudiate the pledges President Hoover made the farmer? The industrial East. Always the industrial East.

Every time agriculture tries to realize for itself one of the tariff advantages promised it, the industrial East looms up as a hostile and opposing force. Directly or indirectly, the industrial East, in nearly every instance, will be found to be furnishing agriculture's opposition with its sinews of war. It is true that the movement to "soak" the farmer in the matter of building costs originates with the Pacific coast lumber interests. But the strength of the movement lies in the fact that the Pacific coast group entered into a coalition with the industrial East. The Pacific coast group, alone and unsupported, would never have got anywhere. Yet, when Pacific coast lumber supports eastern cement, and eastern cement, in exchange, supports Pacific coast lumber, the alliance to hurt the farmer becomes formidable.

Philosophic observers of the American scene have often noted that, in including the agrarian West and the industrial East under the same broad head, the Republican Party had within its fold two groups of opposed economic interests.

Never before, within our recollection, has the cleavage had such high visibility.

If the Republican Party's intention to give the agrarian West a degree of tariff protection equal to that enjoyed by the industrial East is not lived up to, the reason will not be far to seek. The industrial East will have been the force which torpedoed the administration program. It will then be clear that the industrial East never gave anything more than lip homage to Mr. Hoover's promises, that it ignored the party pledges, that it is the determined and militant enemy of the agrarian West, and that the Republican Party is impotent to aid agriculture as long as the industrial East continues to dominate it.

Some immensely serious consequences are attached to the foregoing conclusions.

The Tribune is not, in general, an advocate of sectionalism; in fact, deplores the spirit of sectionalism, but who can be so blind as not to see what is bound to happen in the event that the industrial East continues to smother and stifle the agrarian West?

We hardly need say that a time will come when the party will be too small to hold both groups.

We wish it understood that this is noted objectively, and not thrown out in an admonitory spirit. The point is one which should become apparent to anyone on a moment's reflection. It is our belief that the East has not yet fully comprehended the seriousness of the situation, and that it does not yet completely grasp what the reaction will be once the agrarian West arrives at the fixed conviction that, no matter what the Republican Party promises, it is powerless to aid agriculture because the industrial East is in a position to enforce its will upon the party.

The industrial East can well afford to give some thought to the game it is now playing. We grant the industrial East its great political strength. We concede that, if it is absolutely bent on fighting the agrarian West, it can probably prevent the West from achieving the tariff equality now asked for by the West. But can not it also see that by following such a course it is courting the danger of driving the agrarian West right out of the Republican Party?

The industrial East, which has never been called deficient in intelligence, should be able to perceive the point that the future of the Republican Party itself hinges to no inconsiderable extent upon the outcome of the present tariff fight. The Republican Party now represents an alliance between the industrial East and the agrarian West. The tariff has become a bone of contention between the two. This means that at the moment the alliance is directly threatening. It means that the danger of a schism is real. If the industrial East chooses to be enlightened, conciliatory, tactful, and well-disposed toward its partner in the alliance, the danger of a schism is naturally minimized. President Hoover, obviously, is doing his best to keep the industrial East in that frame of mind. But if this same industrial East chooses to be porcine, grasping, insular, and pertinaciously obstructionist as regards the agrarian West's efforts to lodge itself on a sound economic foundation, the East is doing nothing less than initiating a sectional and civil war within the ranks of the Republican Party.

These are the considerations which we wish to call to the thoughtful attention of the industrial East. The implications are far-reaching and calculated to give deep concern to everyone interested in the future of the Republican Party. We believe that the time has come for plain speaking. Is the industrial East ready to court the split up of the Republican Party in its endeavors to hold for itself a privileged position as regards the tariff?

We earnestly ask the industrial East to think carefully about what it is doing in ignoring President Hoover's admonitions.

Now let us look at this tariff bill from another angle—that of its effect upon the home. Under the caption "HAWLEY'S Home-killer Tariff," Mercer C. Johnson, editor of The People's Business, issued by the People's Legislative Service, says:

During the recent presidential campaign the national air of the G. O. P. was "Home, Sweet Home."

As a savior of the American home, high heaven itself was to be discounted by the Republican candidate. Providence was told, in substance, that it could go way back in the universe and sit down and leave the home and the home folks to home-loving Herbert and his hosts.

The eyes of American voters, anointed with magic salve, were shown a new heaven and a new earth. Across the face of that new heaven was written "Home, Hoover, Happiness." On that new earth all tears were wiped away and sweet music rang everywhere.

To save its face the promised land did a quick fade out.

It was a beautiful campaign program, and the people fell for it as if it had been manna in the wilderness. The white-washed elephant won in a walk, doing a little lamblike skipping on the side as it strolled down the home stretch.

Then came the special session of Congress, big with promised blessings. Throughout the homes of the land happy expectancy was on tiptoe. What if God were on a holiday! Is not Hoover in the White House? Let joy be unconfined. The feast of fat things is here. Three cheers and a hallelujah for "Home, Hoover, Happiness."

But even while the hallelujah was sounding, the "Home, Hoover, Happiness" sponsors swatted the American home with all their studied might. Out of the secret majority chamber of the House Ways and Means Committee came the Hawley home-killer tariff.

We call it the home-killer tariff because it says in upward of a thousand acts that speak harsher than words, "To hell with your homes and your happiness. We have special interests to serve—campaign debts to pay."

Under the pretext of bringing relief to the farmer the Hawley-Smoot bill lays down upon the American home a veritable brigand's barrage. It shoots into it from every point of the compass, and from earth, water, and air. As to the farmer, we have here but space to say that only the farmer who is "pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw" will be satisfied with the apples of Sodom that this bill brings to his door. The eastern high priests of protection are playing him for a sucker. The rare exceptions will prove the rule.

Henceforth, if this bill becomes a law, between the rank and file of the people and the kind of homes in which they ought to dwell there will be a new economic Death Valley.

It will cost far more to build a home, to shingle a home, to paint a home, to furnish a home with necessities or simple decencies, to provide essential food and clothing for the home folks, not forgetting the baby, to care for the sick. Never in the history of legislation was so large a premium put upon hard-faced human greed.

Does this aggravated assault and battery of the home disturb Mr. Hoover? Not so you could notice it. Indeed, even while it is in progress, with an impatient upward flex, he puts the big-city baby's milk farther away from its hungry mouth.

And this bill proposes to endow this man and his successors with such autocratic power over the ways and means of life as even the God of nations would prefer not to exercise alone in a democratic age.

The Washington Daily News, a Scripps-Howard publication, which vigorously supported the Republican candidate for President last year, expresses the following editorial view of this tariff bill, which, it asserts, is a direct violation of the Republican platform:

The tariff bill is a mess. It is almost everything President Hoover said it must not be. The Republicans in Congress have put the President in a bad political hole.

The President was elected on a specific pledge to limit tariff changes to agriculture and a few industrial schedules. This bill is a general revision. It revises more than 1,000 rates, less than 100 of which are agricultural.

The President pledged adjustments to equalize tariff benefits. This bill makes practically no reductions; it is a wholesale increase.

It will add uncalculated millions to the living cost of the American people in cities, towns, and country.

It will not help the farmers as a class. What benefit to the farmer is a 66 per cent increase in corn tariff when imports are less than 1 per cent of consumption? Or a 100 per cent increase on dairy products when imports are less than 2 per cent? Or a 300 per cent increase on swine when imports are insignificant?

It will hit the common people and hit them hard. It will boost the prices of food, clothing, and shelter. Sugar is raised 60 per cent. Clothing, blankets, wool are increased. The basic building materials, such as cement, lumber, brick, are pushed upward.

And that is not the half of it. The bill's administrative changes are as bad as the rate revisions. It makes the Secretary of the Treasury, instead of the Customs Court, the final judge in evaluation disputes, and thus opens the way for "American valuation" increases. It eliminates the bipartisan character of the Tariff Commission. It makes the Tariff Commission more subservient to the President instead of an independent congressional agency. It extends to dangerous limits the flexible system under which the President can fix tariff rates, the constitutional function of Congress.

The bill's threat to our diplomatic relations and foreign trade is alarming. Already 13 foreign governments have protested to the State Department in one way or another against past and prospective tariff barriers. Our best foreign customers are bitter and are proposing reprisals—Canada, Argentina, Cuba, France, Great Britain, and a dozen others. And this foreign trade of ours is what President Hoover and economists describe as the margin of our national prosperity.

Not content with causing a prospective increase in the cost of living, with putting the President in a political hole, with sabotaging the independent Tariff Commission, with embarrassing diplomatic relations, with threatening our foreign trade, the framers of this bill also side-swiped our civil liberties. It would ban economic, philosophical, and literary classics under a broad prohibition against alleged obscene and seditious publications, making customs officials the sole judges and censors.

We hope an alliance of intelligent Democrats and intelligent Republicans will succeed in defeating the bill in its present form. If it passes, we hope the President will veto it as a violation of the campaign pledges made by himself and his party.

But if the bill becomes law the people may not be the only ones to suffer. What about the party? What about the party's experience in the past?

When the Republican protectionists ride too high, they ride for a fall.

In conclusion I wish to say that I had hoped most sincerely that a tariff measure would be presented which would not be sectional, which would equalize to some extent at least the existing disparity between agriculture and industry, and which would eliminate for all time this system of political log-rolling tariff making by removing the tariff from politics.

This bill is a great disappointment to me, and it will be a great disappointment to those millions of consumers and farmers who under its provisions will be forced to continue for an indefinite period to pay their daily tribute to the tariff barons and those interests for whom the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee have seen fit to erect an insurmountable tariff wall and who in return will no doubt continue to make liberal contributions to the Republican campaign fund.

CITING UNITED STATES CODE IN CENSUS AND APPORTIONMENT BILL

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be directed to insert in the census and apportionment bill just passed reference to the United States Code where the statutes are cited.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that, in engrossing the bill, the Clerk may insert the proper references to the United States Code. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE TARIFF

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks I include a speech delivered by myself before the Home Market Club of Boston, Mass., on March 9, 1929. The speech is as follows:

INTRODUCTION

When our fathers undertook the establishment of homes and a civilization on the North American continent it was practically a vacant land. It is believed that there were then fewer Indians in the vast domain of what was to be the United States than there are to-day. It was an unoccupied land, open and ready for the last great experiment in human government—that of the people, by the people, and for the people. To this form the governments of modern nations are gradually being more or less conformed, but are hindered by their historic backgrounds.

Two great policies sprang up as if indigenous to this soil: That we should be a self-governing people unhampered by foreign influences in our political life, and that we should be a self-sustaining people to the end that economic necessity should not cause our dependency on any other nation or nations. A people economically dependent can not in its fullest sense be a people politically free.

The first of these policies was given expression in various ways, culminating in the Declaration of Independence, the Federal Constitution, and Washington's Farewell Address. The second, in the first act of general legislation approved by President Washington—a protective tariff. Political independence and economic sufficiency make a perfect union.

The product of this union is the present United States, still in its young and vigorous manhood. From colonies discordant and tending to be belligerent, comparatively poor in this world's goods, continually disturbed by Europe's variant ambitions and financial policies, has arisen the greatest Nation in all the tides of time.

Having set a political standard of a new kind, far above those of existing nations, they began to establish other standards on a corresponding plane, including economic independence and standards of living. Since the citizens had supplanted the monarch in the control of government, every citizen shared in the sovereign power. This was at that time an experiment in government, and economic independence was essential to its success. The country must become self-contained and its people self-supporting, dependent upon no other country for the essentials of life.

They set out on what was and is the great political, social, and economic adventure of all time in this world. Its success has far exceeded the fondest expectations of its founders and utterly confounded the prognostications of its opponents in other countries who freely predicted its downfall. In invention, in enterprise, in manufacture, in labor, in agriculture, in wealth, in all material progress, in standards of living, in opportunity, in mental and spiritual development, in efficiency, ability, and character our country and our people are unsurpassed, and, I think I can safely say, also unequaled in this or any other age. Separated from the rest of the world by oceans, our country was a land apart. Washington and his advisers had the inspiration to make it economically independent that no foreign domination of any kind, political or economic, could interfere with the fulfillment of its high destiny.

Other nations have sought aggrandizement through the rapacities of war, but we have shown them a more excellent way.

Many things have contributed to our present greatness as a nation and people, but the greatest of these is protection.

IMPORTANCE OF ECONOMIC INDEPENDENCE TO A PEOPLE POLITICALLY FREE

Economic or commercial independence means that this country is to be self-contained and self-supporting; that we shall raise or produce as nearly as possible all the things we need, selling our surpluses abroad as occasion may require and importing such articles as at any given time we do not have the climatic conditions to produce or which at such time we are not prepared to manufacture in sufficient quantities; that we reserve our domestic market primarily for the products of our own people; that we establish and maintain standards of living becoming to a free people, of which every citizen is a sovereign, under conditions that make that standard ever rising; and that we advance our civilization.

What will it profit our people if under free trade or its various aliases we pawn our birthright and lose that distinction we have so long labored to attain, namely, better conditions of life, which are the soul of a people. We have set for ourselves the economic standards we deem vital to our perpetuity. A mighty Nation, with a destiny to which no one can set the limit of attainment, must of necessity have a people strong in themselves and in the material advantages essential to their support. We were the first great representative Government. Others have emulated our example in government by the people. We were the first Nation to declare as uncompromisingly for economic independence and for those better standards of living requisite to the public welfare.

THE AMERICAN MARKET, GREATEST IN THE WORLD, DUE TO PROTECTION

What is the American market? The American market is a place in which national wealth has been increased from $88,500,000,000 in 1900 to an amount approximately $300,000,000,000 at this time, giving us capital to do business on a giant scale. It is a place where 117,000,000 people are living better than anywhere else in the world; a Nation able to stand the shock of the World War without a tremor and afford its allies aid in hitherto unbelievable amounts; the only great Nation whose Government by free men now rests firmly on its foundation. Here we produce yearly nearly $90,000,000,000 of new wealth or wealth in new and usable forms, $15,000,000,000 from the industries depending on the soil, $6,000,000,000 from mines, $63,000,000,000 from industry, and other amounts from lesser sources. What is done with this annual output exceeding in value the public wealth of some other nations after deducting their indebtedness? Our people consume more than 90 per cent of the products of manufacture, 91 per cent of all the products of the soil except cotton, and 85 per cent including cotton, and a considerable proportion of the mineral products. It is a market having an enormous purchasing power, in part for use and in part for saving, and is a market in which 27,000,000 wage earners, exclusive of those employed in agriculture and public services, receive wages three or more times greater than those of other nations. The universal opinion of thoughtful men everywhere is that this truly magnificent result is founded on the protective tariff.

PURPOSES OF A PROTECTIVE TARIFF

The protective-tariff policy is intended to protect the American producer of commodities of all kinds and all the persons interested in such production from unfair competition from abroad. It deals solely with sales made in the United States. It has no purpose to deal with sales of American-made goods when they are exported to other countries. There is no way by which we can extend the advantages of a protective tariff to cover sales made in foreign lands. Neither does the protective tariff propose to deal with conditions in the markets of this country when the question at issue does not arise from unfair competition from abroad. All industries at times find that their production exceeds the domestic demand, and market must be found for them elsewhere. But such sales do not come within the purview or scope of operation of a protective tariff. When surpluses occur, as is now the case in agriculture, and provision for their disposal becomes necessary to relieve a basic industry, that, in my judgment, should be effected by legislation independent of the tariff.

TARIFF—A DOMESTIC QUESTION

The protective tariff is a domestic question. Foreign interests have no inherent right to trade in our markets. The admission of imports is an act of comity between nations and we have the right to prescribe the conditions on which they shall enter this country and our markets. Several foreign governments and interests requested that their representatives be heard before the committee at the hearings. It was ruled, however, that the appearance of foreign governments or foreign interests before a committee of the legislative body on a domestic question was inadvisable for several reasons. Only citizens of the United States or persons doing business in the United States were heard. However, representations made by foreign governments, through the Department of State, were received as matters of information. The committee desired to obtain all available information.

Several foreign governments are taking a very active interest in the pending readjustments. We have no desire or intention of interfering with or preventing a proper flow of international trade. The endeavor to obtain opportunities for the trade of its nationals is a commendable policy for any government to pursue. Under the existing tariff our foreign trade has greatly increased—approximately 100 per cent. What we have in mind is that Americans should have the primary or preferential right in our markets which they have created by their industry, ingenuity, and foresight. We made it and it belongs to us. From information I have received, our domestic trade totals approximately $90,000,000,000 annually. It is the richest market in the world. It is a cash market. It absorbs enormous quantities of goods, wares, and commodities in infinite variety. Naturally foreigners desire to offer their products here, but this, in my opinion, should not be done to the disadvantage of our people who are properly managing their several businesses.

EARLY CONSIDERATION

It is the intention of the Committee on Ways and Means to have the readjusted tariff ready for consideration by the House by April 15, but not later than April 20, 1929. It should be passed by the House by May 1 and by the Senate and become law before July 4, 1929

Early action will cause the least disturbance in business and enable farmers to receive its benefits during the coming crop season.

So far as rates of duties are concerned, all producers should be on an equality as their respective needs appear. This is the intent and purpose of a protective tariff. And in the pending readjustment the evidence submitted by witnesses and verified by official agencies will be carefully considered and readjustments proposed where such are proven necessary and justified.

PROCEDURE IN PROPOSED READJUSTMENT—1929

The existing tariff law has in general resulted beneficially to the industries of the United States. But in a growing country, in an age of great industrial development, where new methods are continually being adopted, improved machinery installed, new articles manufactured, and where new sources of foreign competition are continually arising, such advancements necessitate modified readjustments in tariff structure, and it is such readjustments that the Committee on Ways and Means is now engaged in preparing.

In daily hearings extending nearly eight weeks we heard 1,131 witnesses, while many others filed briefs but did not appear orally. Our hearings consist of some 11,000 pages of printed matter.

About a month prior to the hearings the chairman designated each Republican member as the chairman of a subcommittee, the duty of which will be to make the initial examination of the evidence submitted in the hearings, with the aid of experts of the Tariff Commission, the Departments of the Treasury, Agriculture, and Commerce, and other Federal agencies. A subcommittee consists of three members, each being the chairman of a specified schedule. The findings of the subcommittees will be reported to the 15 Republican members, with a statement of the evidence in support of any proposed readjustment. The final conclusion as to what rates of duty will be proposed and what paragraphs will be affected rests with the 15 Republican members so far as the Committee on Ways and Means is concerned. No further hearings will be held. Decisions will be based upon the public record, tested and proven as above indicated. The Republican members of the committee fully appreciate the responsibilities they have and the difficulties involved and propose so to perform their work that readjustments will be made where they are necessary and justified in the interest of the general welfare of the whole country.

EFFECT OF DUTIES

Duties cause foreigners to contribute, in proportion to the business done, to the common treasury for the privilege of trading in the American market. In recent years this amount is approximately $600,000,000 per annum. Duties collected are really taken out of the profits that would otherwise have left this country to find their way into the pockets of foreign producers. The sale of foreign products in our markets is not a philanthropic movement in behalf of the American consumer. Imports are sold to the best advantage for the best price that can be obtained and maintain their markets, and, since their costs of production are much below those in this country, they constitute a menace to our labor, agriculture, and industry.

After years of consideration, I do not see any possibility that our people would benefit if imports were allowed to come in practically duty free. We would be charged all the traffic could bear and have less with which to buy. It would also sap the foundations of our standards of living, which is one of the outstanding features of Americanism. The protective tariff has so fostered our economic life in all its phases, reduced costs of production, reduced prices to the consumer, maintained our high and advancing standards that it offers the sure hope of continued prosperity and progress for all our people.

EFFECTIVENESS OF A DUTY

In general, it may be said that the effectiveness of a duty depends largely on the market. No academic reply is possible, nor can any rule be prescribed for measuring the effect of a given duty on a specified commodity in the absence of information on the market conditions. For this reason we study the past history of goods, wares, and commodities, the quantities produced in this country and where produced, domestic competition, domestic prices, quantities consumed in the United States, and all costs of production; also imports as to quantities, prices, distribution, countries of origin, costs of production, and possibilities of increases in quantities imported. From these and other factors a conclusion may be reached as to the probable course of the market and consequently the rates of duties necessary to afford proper protection. The effectiveness of a duty will vary with the market.

Speaking generally, a rate of duty expresses the difference between production costs at home and abroad for that material part of the total production with which foreign competition is most effective and in which management is fairly efficient. It may be sufficient in the case of better-managed or more favorably located plants and at times insufficient for less effective management or inferior location. Tariffs can not take the place of sound management or suitable location.

QUESTIONS ARISING IN DETERMINING DUTIES

It would appear that these questions are more in evidence than at former hearings.

In determining the rate of duty to be imposed it is necessary to decide what conditions of American production will form the basis. I speak especially concerning manufacturing enterprises. Plants are located in various parts of the country. Each section has advantages and disadvantages of which four may be cited:

First. Proximity to raw material.

Second. Proximity to fuel or power.

Third. Proximity to markets.

Fourth. Facilities of transportation.

Presupposing management to be equally efficient in the several instances, a plant so located as to be near raw material, close to its supply of fuel or power, near to markets and with moderate freight burdens, and near to an adequate labor supply, other things being equal, has a distinct advantage; and one distant from labor, from raw materials, from fuel and power, and from markets, with consequent high freight burdens has a distinct disadvantage. Plants having only some of the advantages will be beneficially located in proportion to the advantages possessed. Production costs will vary with the advantages availed of. A duty sufficient only for the most favorably located plants might tend to their benefit at the expense of their less favorably located domestic competitors. Plants least favorably located have the status of marginal producers who tend to disappear. That is, unless careful consideration is given, a tariff may have a tendency to redistribute production. Our opponents charge that a high tariff promotes monopoly. It seems to me that our experience proves the contrary so far as domestic production is concerned. A low tariff might tend toward monopoly under the conditions cited above. No general rule can be stated. Each such situation must be studied on its merits, and the rate of duty fixed to foster sufficient production without unnecessary interference with domestic conditions. Overproduction involves problems in the solution of which the tariff is only one factor.

Experience indicates, however, that in the great majority of instances foreign competition is keener in certain localities than in others. When such storm centers are accurately located, whatever rate of duty will be sufficient for them will also take care of all the others. Problems stated above cause tariff makers many difficulties and serious hours of investigation and study, for tariffs deal not alone with foreign competition but also may affect domestic competition.

MARGINAL PRODUCERS

Industries which establish the sites of their plants without proper reference to the sources of their raw materials, markets for their products, and without due consideration for transportation and freight rates and the opportunity to employ suitable labor, have assumed unusual risks.

Those producers who have their raw materials, including fuel or power, their markets and labor supply near at hand, and whose transportation costs are low, are most favorably located. But these are few; those who have one of the three are probably at an advantage, and those who locate without reference to markets, materials, including power or fuel, or labor, are usually at the greatest disadvantage. The above are general statements, to all of which it is possible to find striking exceptions. Well-located businesses may be poorly managed, and those disadvantageously located may be brilliantly conducted.

The point I am emphasizing is both the difficulty and necessity in determining what rate of duty should be imposed for any industry or product as a whole, that it may operate fairly and promote a production adequate for our needs, country-wide.

PROTECTIVE TARIFF—AN ILLUSTRATION OF COMMUNITY OF INTEREST

The producers of America include miners, farmers, wage earners, manufacturers, and industry generally, who purchase the products of each other. The farmer sells generally raw products for immediate consumption or to be processed by industry. His largest ultimate market is the 27,000,000 of our people who derive their livelihood by being on some pay roll. The farmer's prosperity depends largely on the prosperity of industry which provides the pay rolls. Immediately after the World War industries processing farm products found this unprofitable under the tariff then existing and the farmer's sales fell off by hundreds of millions of dollars. Wage earners were out of employment and their consumption was curtailed. On the other hand, farmers who comprise approximately 30 per cent of our population, purchase freely the outputs of labor and industry. They furnish the materials that feed and clothe the Nation. Cities and towns are markets which effect interchanges of goods, wares, and commodities. For instance, after one year's operation, the present tariff had caused such a revival in business that 1,832,380 workers were restored to pay rolls in certain lines of industry in which labor received an increase of wages of $2,808,973,000; industry had increased its purchases of materials for manufacture by $9,363,101,000, and the farmers' sales had increased about $2,000,000,000.

Time will not permit further comment on our economic solidarity, except to say that while individually our interests are diverse and competitive, generally our interests are common and a universal prosperity is the goal toward which we all strive.

LABOR

A number of the representatives of labor and labor organizations appeared at the hearings, and without exception, as I recall, earnestly urged the levying of duties adequate to protect the manufacturer and the wage earner, affirming that in this their interests were mutual. Recent investigations have shown that labor abroad receives only 40 per cent or less of the American wage scales. The American working man is unable to maintain our standard of living on foreign wage scales. His fight to protect his home and fireside is entirely justified and characteristically American.

FOREIGN COMPETITION

In the consideration of successive tariff acts it is to be noted that the number of effective foreign competing countries is steadily increasing. In 1922 Japan was added to the list, with Italy a decided factor. At the recent hearing both Italy and Czechoslovakia have appeared as important sources of competition. The several countries do not compete in all the items in the schedules, but each is very active in a number. The attractiveness of the American market is making a strong appeal, and goods in considerable quantities are being produced especially designed for the American market. In a number of instances goods popular in our markets have been so duplicated that there is little difference in the articles. It appears that wages paid in foreign countries average less than 40 per cent of those paid in this country. The wages in the several competing countries very materially being highest in England and lowest in Italy, Japan, and Czechoslovakia as a rule.

One item of especial significance appeared at this hearing: The efficiency of foreign labor is greatly increasing. The introduction in competing countries of machinery like ours, the training of foreign workmen employed in our factories who return to their home countries to manage plants, and the numbers of skilled Americans who are employed abroad is bringing the efficiency of foreign labor up toward the standards of American labor. This is a serious matter. An instance of its working may be cited in the case of raw materials purchased in the United States, shipped to Europe, manufactured there, and returned to our country in the form of completed articles at cost prices materially below those of the American producers.

ECONOMIC INVASION NO LESS DANGEROUS THAN POLITICAL INVASION

The Colonies, which became the United States, resisted the attempted domination of their business enterprises. Resistance to such domination became a material factor in forming a sentiment which led to the war of 1776 and to independence. Since that great day the foot of the hostile invader has come in only to go out in haste. In pursuance of our policy to be free from foreign control in every respect, the first general law adopted under the Constitution was a tariff act for the protection of our industrious people. If we resist political invasion, why not economic invasion? Both are equally harmful to the liberties of our people. Protection has been the policy of statesmen whose great names and illustrious service to the Union adorn the pages of our history. But few times, and those to the sorrow and disaster of our people, has the economic hand of the foreigner been given opportunity to control our economic life and the standards of living. Wise men of all parties in the past have upheld the policy of a protective tariff. We pay tribute to none. Washington's advice of continuing wisdom and permanent value counseling "entangling alliances with none but friendship to all" is as important to economics as to political entanglements. When in the convocation of the world older states and nations, boasting their long struggles to attain their economic independence and to establish their own national standards of living, shall raise their voices and say, "With a great price bought we this freedom," America shall lift her queenly head with the yet prouder answer, "But I was free-born."

FORGET PARTISANSHIP

Mr. KADING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a short editorial from the Sheboygan Press.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. EDWARDS. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] has been objecting to the insertion of these editorials in the RECORD, and I do not see him here.

Mr. RANKIN. I hope the gentleman will not object. The Wisconsin papers up there have been discussing the farm-relief Congress.

Mr. EDWARDS. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. KADING. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following short editorial from the Sheboygan Press:

FORGET PARTISANSHIP

Congress is facing perplexing problems in a special session called by President Hoover. The tariff and farm relief bills have so divided the groups that there is bitterness even among the administration forces.

We would very much regret to see either of these bills made a party measure. Republicans and Democrats should get together on a common ground, forgetting party differences, and enact a law that will be beneficial to the farmer, and at the same time be fair to the country as a whole. There can be no continued prosperity unless the farmer shares in that prosperity.

Personally we regret to see the tariff injected into Congress at any time. It tends to upset and undermine business and has a demoralizing effect. Just as soon as there is a tariff bill reported out, it invites criticism. You can not, in the heat of a debate on the floor of Congress, enact any kind of a tariff bill that will be beneficial. We had hoped long ago to see the tariff studied by a commission with power to remedy after fruitful discussion and consideration.

It should not be a political football in an arena as it is now.

THE TARIFF

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the tariff bill by making some comments on the table which was inserted by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH], which, in fact, is supplemental to a table I inserted during the discussion of the bill.

Mr. WINGO. What is it?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. A table from the Tariff Commission.

Mr. WINGO. Is that the table which put in so many manufactured products under the head of agriculture, like silk, and so forth?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Silk was included in the manufactures.

Mr. WINGO. Table 17 in the hearings carried a list of things as agricultural products, and about one-half of them were not agricultural products.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. When the first paragraph was read I inserted a table which had been furnished me by the Tariff Commission. A moment ago the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] inserted a supplemental table, of which I have received a copy, which can well be compared with the table I inserted during the debate.

Mr. WINGO. In view of the table inserted by the gentleman from New Jersey, I think the gentleman ought to explain further.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST $25,000 PRIZE-WINNING PLAN

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating the plan which won the $25,000 Hearst prize in the prohibition contest.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy extended by the House in granting my request for an extension of remarks on the prohibition question and the inclusion of the $25,000 prize-winning plan submited by Hon. Franklin Chase Hoyt in the nation-wide contest sponsored by that sterling American citizen, Mr. William Randolph Hearst.

The operation of the existing prohibition laws has convinced Mr. Hearst that a liberalized modification of these laws must be effected if the best interests of our Republic and its people are to be maintained. Each day's tragic news brings to the attention of the American people the failure of the existing prohibition laws. Under these sumptuary laws, rights guaranteed to our people under the Constitution have been flaunted and ignored, such as the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures; and also that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

The excessive, wanton toll of human lives taken by Federal officers charged with enforcing prohibition laws, culminating in the assassination of Henry Wirkkula near International Falls, Minn., has even caused the citizens of the Republic to be fearful that their lives may be snuffed out at any time they traverse the highways. Prohibition has failed in the open field and has reached the stage of guerrilla warfare. In time of peace in a peaceful Nation it even violates the rules of war among the civilized nations of the world. The sniping of peaceful law-abiding American citizens from ambush by prohibition-enforcement agents parallels the atrocities of the most savage and uncivilized tribes in the history of the world. Under the existing system the Federal killers are tried in Federal courts and defended by Federal officials, notwithstanding the fact that the people desire a trial in the local courts where the cards are not stacked in advance for acquittal. A great majority of the American people—including some of the most zealous advocates of prohibition—have reached the realization that the Anti-Saloon League, which was mainly responsible for the enactment of the prohibition laws, should be held in disrepute. The hired men of this organization, receiving their bread and butter from a half million dollar subsidy of the notorious 5-and-10-cent-store magnate, surely should be the last to convince decent, respecting American citizens that prohibition should continue, from a moral standpoint.

The plan which received the first prize in the Hearst nation-wide contest for the solution of the highly important prohibition question should be tried out. It can not be denied that the consumption of distilled spirits created the situation which brought about the enactment of the existing prohibition laws.

This plan confirms the view, which I have repeatedly stated, that the immediate objective to overcome the deplorable situation caused by the prohibition laws was not the repeal or change of the eighteenth amendment but a reasonable and sensible amendment of the Volstead Act.

The first-prize plan can be supported, without apology, by all of those who believe in temperance, including the most rabid prohibitionists, who, if they are honest with themselves, must admit that a deplorable situation exists at the present time due to the sumptuary prohibition laws. William Randolph Hearst is to be commended for the patriotic purpose in launching the contest for a plan to cure the existing evil. The prize-winning plan, if enacted into law, will solve the problem and again inculcate in the hearts of the American people respect and obedience to law and order, and such a measure can be passed by Congress without fear of being construed as unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

When Congress reconvenes I shall introduce a bill carrying out the prohibition modification plan as embodied in the prize-winning plan in the Hearst contest, as I believe that a great majority of the American citizens favor this plan of modification as against the existing prohibition laws favored by the notorious 5-and-10-cent-store magnate who has subsidized the Anti-Saloon League to the tune of half a million dollars. I appreciate the sterling character and the high ideals of American citizenship as practiced and expounded by William Randolph Hearst and would rather be a private soldier in the ranks of his crusaders than a general in the ranks of the crusaders of the Anti-Saloon League.

President Hoover's Crime Investigating Commission is searching for a remedy for the present breakdown in law enforcement as the result of the unworkable prohibition laws. This commission should certainly give Justice Hoyt's plan its most careful consideration. The issue has gone beyond the question of prohibition. We are now faced with the problem of law enforcement and how to obtain respect for law. Justice Hoyt's plan points the way out.

The following is the full text of the $25,000 prize-winning temperance plan:

TEXT OF PLAN SELECTED AS BEST CURE FOR PROHIBITION EVILS

By Franklin Chase Hoyt, presiding justice children's court, city of New York

The object of this competition, as I understand it, is to offer a plan which will promote temperance and which will reestablish respect for the law in all sections of our country. In other words, to suggest a workable, honest, and sensible substitute for the existing scheme of national prohibition as we know it to-day.

The limitations of this contest obviously prevent any discussion of the failures of the present system or of the conditions which now prevail throughout our land. Such discussion, however, is hardly necessary, since these facts are known to all. But, passing over the moralities (or immoralities) of the present situation and coming directly to the practical problems which must be faced before a change in our system can be effected, I believe that many thoughtful Americans, dry or wet, who have studied this problem will agree on these three propositions:

1. That the eighteenth amendment can not be replaced for many years to come. It would appear impossible to secure the consent of 36 States to such action in the near future, and that impossibility becomes all the more apparent when it is considered that many opponents of prohibition in the wet and doubtful States would not tolerate a possible return to the conditions which prevailed in bygone days.

AVOIDS STATE DISPENSARY

2. That the proposal to permit the States at their option to dispense liquor will never prove acceptable. The idea of a State becoming a partner in the sale or distribution of liquor would prove repugnant to many who oppose prohibition.

3. That a possible modification of the Volstead Act as to the alcoholic content of beverages offers no real solution of the problem—a trivial increase would undoubtedly prove ineffective as an honest substitute for the present system, while a large increase presumably would be condemned by the courts as long as we have a Federal statute prohibiting "alcoholic beverages" as such.

If the system is to be changed, such change must be based squarely and honestly upon sensible definitions and not upon unsatisfactory tinkerings with alcoholic percentages.

Assuming these three premises to be true, can any solution be found which will promote temperance and unite all sections of the country in support of the law? Can a better plan be proposed than that which prevails to-day? I for one believe so.

The eighteenth amendment prohibits "the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes." Despite popular belief it does not refer to "alcoholic beverages." What it bans is "intoxicating liquors," and if these two words could be defined intelligently it would solve the whole problem.

OFFERS SUBSTITUTE LAW

I, therefore, submit this plan: Let Congress repeal the Volstead Act and substitute a law defining the words "intoxicating liquors" as "all alcoholic products of distillation." Let it ban the manufacture, sale, and transportation of such products throughout the country, except for commercial and medicinal purposes, but at the same time let it permit each State to regulate and control the manufacture and sale of all malt, brewed and fermented beverages within its own borders.

The word "liquor" in the past was very generally applied to distilled spirits in contradistinction to fermented products, and in common parlance, even at the adoption of the eighteenth amendment, the word "liquor" usually meant spirituous drinks, such as whisky, gin, brandy, etc. Even to-day our dictionaries define "liquor" as an especial product of distillation and as one of a spirituous character, as distinguished from beer, wines, etc.

Would the Supreme Court acquiesce in this interpretation of the eighteenth amendment? Why not? It is scarcely believable, if Congress should pass a law defining its interpretation of the constitutional amendment as suggested, that the Supreme Court would take it upon itself to nullify the will of the representatives of the people.

It must be remembered that the ablest court decisions generally recognize and respect the necessity of interpreting the law in accordance with changing social ideas and conditions.

Even if the Supreme Court should finally condemn this proposed interpretation of the eighteenth amendment, thus requiring another constitutional amendment to put it into effect, such an amendment would at least be simple to understand and easy to act upon.

The insertion of the word "distilled" before the words "intoxicating liquors" would settle the whole question. Surely such an amendment would be easier of passage than any complicated provisions relating to State dispensation or the regulation of alcoholic content.

Space forbids any dissertation contrasting the products of distillation and fermentation. It suffices to say that distillation is the act of man and has been responsible for practically all the evils which "liquor" has inflicted upon the human race, while fermentation is the act of nature, and that to many must mean, in the most reverential sense, the act of God.

It is inconceivable that any government can carry on a successful war against nature and force unwilling communities to obey sumptuary laws which they reject and despise. Such laws, as Blackstone has pointed out, are "regulations destructive of liberty." If our Federal Government persists in denying any latitude to the States in their regulation of fermented products, the States in their turn may refuse, one by one, to support the present illogical scheme of prohibition.

If, on the other hand, the Federal Government should confine its jurisdiction as suggested, what would be the result? I believe that every State and every decent citizen would loyally support our Government in this respect. I believe that the prohibition question would disappear from national politics and that traffic in distilled liquor would eventually come to be regarded as shameful as that in drugs and narcotics.

Finally, I believe that the cause of true temperance would be promoted and that, at least, there would be some end to the disillusionment, discouragement, and disrespect for the law which to-day, unfortunately, are so widespread throughout our land.

ADDRESSES ON THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

Mr. BEERS. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 44

Resolved, That the addresses delivered on April 25 and April 26, 1929, in the auditorium of the United States Chamber of Commerce Building at a meeting held in Washington, D. C., for the purpose of discussing the development of the National Capital, be printed, with illustrations, as a House document, and that 5,000 additional copies be printed, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the House document room and 4,000 copies for the use of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman why the disparity in the distribution of these documents?

Mr. GARNER. I would like to ask the gentleman what the cost of this is?

Mr. BEERS. Two thousand two hundred and forty-six dollars and forty-three cents.

Mr. GARNER. I want to call attention to this request. These documents will be absolutely worthless as far as being of any value to the Congress or anything else except the matter of art.

I do not think you ought to spend $2,200 for that purpose. You have the power to pass it. I understand that it is privileged, and you have the votes; but I want the House to understand what it is doing—spending $2,200 without any reason on the face of the earth, in my opinion, for it, and without any benefit to Congress or to the people of the United States.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEERS. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I want to know whether I understand the resolution correctly. Is it 4,000 copies for the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and 1,000 copies to the document room?

Mr. BEERS. Yes. A great many requests are coming from the architects of the country.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact. There are about 20 members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It is proposed here to give those members 4,000 copies, and the remaining 400 Members 1,000 copies. We have some architects in our districts, the same as do the gentlemen who happen to be on this committee.

Mr. BEERS. They can get all they want by simply applying to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WINGO. But why should we have to go to them? Why should we not have them as a matter of right? If the gentleman makes it 1,000 to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and 4,000 to the other Members of the House, I think then the proportion will be pretty large for the committee. I am very fond of the distinguished chairman of that committee, and I know that he is a very capable gentleman to trust with the distribution of art objects.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEERS. Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Permit me to make a suggestion. A certain number of these documents should be placed where they can be handed to the architects of the country. There is no way that we can direct that they be given to some individual outside of Congress. What I would like to do in the matter would be to have 1,000 of these placed in the hands of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, so that I could distribute the proper amount of them to the architects, and let the rest of them be distributed through the folding room.

Mr. WINGO. My suggestion was to that effect, and if that be done I shall not object to it.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I think that will be proper.

Mr. WINGO. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. BEERS. I am satisfied to make that change.

Mr. WINGO. Then, I suggest that the gentleman offer that as an amendment.

Mr. BEERS. Mr. Speaker, I offer that as an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BEERS: Line 7, strike out the word "one" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four," and in line 8, strike out "document" and insert in lieu thereof "folding," and in line 9, strike out the word "four" and insert "one."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

AMERICAN MILITARY CEMETERIES IN EUROPE—KENTUCKY AND THE WORLD WAR

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD touching the subject of military cemeteries in France, and to include therewith as a part of my remarks certain War Department data.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on military cemeteries in France, including certain data. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the blood and the dust of American soldiers, sailors, and marines will render forever sacred the soil of World War battle fields and various military cemeteries of Europe. During that unprecedented struggle thousands of the flower of our American youth, in one form or another, paid the "supreme penalty," and exercised the noblest prerogative of patriotism by yielding up life itself in defense and protection of the principles symbolized by their flag and embodied in the laws and institutions of their Government. If the significance of the sacrifice thus made by these, our deathless dead, shall be kept in mind by the living of this day, and by those who shall live in the days to come, the sacrifice, though incalculable, shall not have been made in vain; but if forgotten, or treated lightly, it shall prove itself to have been of no avail.

Kentucky, my own beloved State, as in every war during our national life, made, to this, the greatest conflict of history, her full contribution. In treasure of money and life and effort she met and overmet every demand and obligation of that frightful period.

As typical of her indomitable and patriotic spirit it may be recalled that in one of her counties, Breathitt, the World War draft was rendered entirely unnecessary for the reason that the required quota was more than filled by volunteers. This record, I believe, was unmatched by any other county in the entire Nation.

With other States and with the Territories and possessions of our country, Kentucky finds in the American military cemeteries of Europe a common bond or touch, for there lie buried in those hallowed places many of Kentucky's knightliest sons. All told, there are nearly 500 of her youth who sleep to-day in those cemeterial spots. The Quartermaster General of the United States Army has very kindly furnished me a list setting forth the names, organizations, and grave locations of the deceased members of the American military forces from Kentucky, who served in the World War and whose remains are thus interred. The names and locations of these cemeteries follow:

FRANCE

No. 1232, Meuse-Argonne American Cemetery, Romagne-sous-Montfaucon, Meuse.

No. 1764, Aisne-Marne American Cemetery, Belleau, Aisne.

No. 34, Suresnes American Cemetery, Suresnes, Seine (near Paris).

No. 636, Somme American Cemetery, Bony, Aisne.

No. 608, Oise-Aisne American Cemetery, Seringes-et-Nesles, Aisne.

No. 1233, St. Mihiel American Cemetery, Thiaucourt, Meurthe-et-Moselle.

BELGIUM

No. 1252, Flanders Field American Cemetery, Waereghem, Belgium.

ENGLAND

No. 107–E, Brookwood American Cemtery, Brookwood (near London), England.

The indicated list of Kentuckians in these cemeteries, together with other valuable information, as shown by the records of the War Department, is set forth as follows:

The Congress of the United States by act approved March 2, 1929, Public Law 952 of the Seventieth Congress, has made provision for pilgrimages to be made to these European cemeteries by mothers and widows of members of the military and naval forces of the United States whose remains rest in these cemeteries. Such pilgrimages may be made at the expense of the United States under the conditions as set forth in section 2 of the act. The act is as follows:

Public Law No. 952, Seventieth Congress (S. 5332)

An act to enable the mothers and widows of the deceased soldiers, sailors, and marines of the American forces now interred in the cemeteries of Europe to make a pilgrimage to these cemeteries

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to arrange for pilgrimages to cemeteries in Europe by mothers and widows of members of the military or naval forces of the United States who died in the military or naval service at any time between April 5, 1917, and July 1, 1921, and whose remains are now interred in such cemeteries. Such pilgrimages shall be made at the expense of the United States under the conditions set forth in section 2.

SEC. 2. The conditions under which such pilgrimages may be made are as follows:

(a) Invitations to make the pilgrimages shall be extended in the name of the United States to the mothers and widows for whom the pilgrimages are authorized to be arranged under section 1.

(b) Upon acceptance of the invitation the mother or widow shall be entitled to make one such pilgrimage; but no mother or widow who has previous to the pilgrimage visited cemeteries described in section 1 shall be entitled to make any such pilgrimage, and no mother or widow shall be entitled to make more than one such pilgrimage.

(c) The pilgrimages shall be made at such times during the period from May 1, 1930, to October 31, 1933, as may be designated by the Secretary of War.

(d) For the purpose of the pilgrimages the Secretary of State shall (1) issue special passports limited to the duration of the pilgrimage, to mothers and widows making the pilgrimages and to such personnel as may be selected to accompany and/or arrange for the pilgrimages, if such mothers, widows, and personnel are citizens of the United States, and (2) issue suitable travel documents, if aliens. No fee for either of such documents or for any application therefor shall be charged. Such alien mothers, widows, and personnel shall be permitted to return and be granted admission to the United States without regard to any law, convention, or treaty relating to the immigration or exclusion of aliens, if the return is made within the period covered by the pilgrimage of the particular group or, in the case of personnel, within such times as the Secretary of War shall by regulation prescribe; except that in any case of unavoidable detention the Secretary of War may extend in such case the time during which return may be made without regard to such laws, conventions, or treaties.

(e) The pilgrimages shall be by the shortest practicable route and for the shortest practicable time, to be designated by the Secretary of War. No mother or widow shall be provided for at Government expense in Europe for a longer period than two weeks from the time of disembarkation in Europe to the time of reembarkation in Europe. In the case of any mother or widow willfully failing to continue the pilgrimage of her particular group, the United States shall not incur or be subject to any expense with regard to her pilgrimage after such failure.

(f) Vessels owned or operated by the United States Government or any agency thereof shall be used for transportation at sea wherever practicable.

(g) Suitable transportation, accommodations, meals, and other necessities pertaining thereto, as prescribed by the Secretary of War, shall be furnished each mother or widow included in any pilgrimage for the entire distance at sea and on land and while sojourning in Europe and while en route in the United States from home to port and from port to home. Cabin-class accommodations shall be furnished for all transportation at sea. No mother or widow shall be entitled, by reason of any payment made by or for her, to be furnished by the Government with transportation, accommodations, meals, and other necessities pertaining thereto different in kind from those prescribed by the Secretary of War for the pilgrimage of the particular group.

(h) All pilgrimages shall be made in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of War may from time to time prescribe as to the time, route, itineraries, composition of groups, accommodations, transportation, program, arrangements, management, and other matters pertaining to such pilgrimages.

SEC. 3. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act. The Secretary of War is directed to make an investigation for the purpose of determining (1) the total number of mothers and widows entitled to make the pilgrimages, (2) the number of such mothers and widows who desire to make the pilgrimages and the number who desire to make the pilgrimages during the calendar year 1930, and (3) the probable cost of the pilgrimages to be made. The Secretary of War shall report to the Congress not later than December 15, 1929, the results of such investigation.

SEC. 4. As used in this act—

(a) The term "mother" means mother, stepmother, mother through adoption, or any woman who stood in loco parentis to the deceased member of the military or naval forces for the year prior to the commencement of his service in such forces.

(b) The term "widow" means a widow who has not remarried since the death of the member of the military or naval forces.

The action of Congress in the enactment of this legislation was a tender and considerate one; but it was in no wise above or beyond the obligations imposed by the situation presented. Our war mothers and widows have been irreparably bereft by reason of the loss of their sons and husbands through the fate of a foreign war. It is therefore wholly just that the American Nation should make due provision for these pilgrimages to be made, so that these mothers and wives who yet survive may know the holy comfort which may be theirs, when, at last, after long years of yearning, they shall stand at the graves of their sacred dead.

THE PILGRIMAGE OF GOLD-STAR MOTHERS TO EUROPE—NEW JERSEY AND THE WORLD WAR

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, within a short time plans will have been perfected for the pilgrimage of Gold-Star Mothers to the foreign lands where their loved ones "still hold the ground they won."

Just a few days ago many of us stood with uncovered heads in our cemeteries at home. As the impressive Memorial Day services were read in memory of those who have valiantly marched beyond the horizon to answer the soldier's last roll call there were many whose thoughts were carried beyond the seas where under foreign skies there sleeps a son, a husband, a brother, a loved one who will never return to the land he loved.

In marble-monumented cities of the dead, loving hands placed flowers and the beautiful colors of our country upon the graves of the soldier and sailor dead who lie where their last resting place may receive the tender ministrations of their dear ones, but as the plaintive, throbbing notes of the bugle resounded throughout the land the strains of the soldier's farewell—"Taps"—we thought of comrades overseas under the blue skies of France and Belgium, silently yet gloriously holding ground that will be forever American.

Of the soldier dead upon the battle field that brilliant young poet, Joyce Kilmer, who went from my district singing bravely down the road that led to a soldier's death, said:

There is on earth no nobler grave,
To hold the body of the brave,
Than this, the spot of pain and pride,
Where they nobly fought and nobly died.

During the last session of Congress it was my privilege, as a member of the Military Affairs Committee, to join in recommending to the House of Representatives the passage of legislation that will permit the mothers and widows of those members of the American Expeditionary Forces who are still buried abroad to visit the foreign lands where their loved ones rest. With due appreciation of the sacrifices that were made, and under the inspiration of lofty patriotism that is all too rare in days when selfish pursuits carry us far from the thoughts that prompted our people, in 1917, to give of their time, their fortunes, and even the blood of those they loved, so that America might not go down, the Congress enacted the law that will make possible the fulfillment of the Gold Star Mothers' hopes, the most sentimental and sacred pilgrimage in the history of our Nation.

This is the law:

Public Law No. 952, Seventieth Congress (S. 5332)

An act to enable the mothers and widows of the deceased soldiers, sailors, and marines of the American forces now interred in the cemeteries of Europe to make a pilgrimage to these cemeteries

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to arrange for pilgrimages to cemeteries in Europe by mothers and widows of members of the military or naval forces of the United States who died in the military or naval service at any time between April 5, 1917, and July 1, 1921, and whose remains are now interred in such cemeteries. Such pilgrimages shall be made at the expense of the United States under the conditions set forth in section 2.

SEC. 2. The conditions under which such pilgrimages may be made are as follows:

(a) Invitations to make the pilgrimages shall be extended in the name of the United States to the mothers and widows for whom the pilgrimages are authorized to be arranged under section 1.

(b) Upon acceptance of the invitation the mother or widow shall be entitled to make one such pilgrimage; but no mother or widow who has previous to the pilgrimage visited cemeteries described in section 1 shall be entitled to make any such pilgrimage, and no mother or widow shall be entitled to make more than one such pilgrimage.

(c) The pilgrimages shall be made at such times during the period from May 1, 1930, to October 31, 1933, as may be designated by the Secretary of War.

(d) For the purpose of the pilgrimages the Secretary of State shall (1) issue special passports limited to the duration of the pilgrimage, to mothers and widows making the pilgrimages and to such personnel as may be selected to accompany and/or arrange for the pilgrimages, if such mothers, widows, and personnel are citizens of the United States, and (2) issue suitable travel documents, if aliens. No fee for either of such documents or for any application therefor shall be charged. Such alien mothers, widows, and personnel shall be permitted to return and be granted admission to the United States without regard to any law, convention, or treaty relating to the immigration or exclusion of aliens, if the return is made within the period covered by the pilgrimage of the particular group or, in the case of personnel, within such times as the Secretary of War shall by regulation prescribe; except that in any case of unavoidable detention the Secretary of War may extend in such case the time during which return may be made without regard to such laws, conventions, or treaties.

(e) The pilgrimages shall be by the shortest practicable route and for the shortest practicable time, to be designated by the Secretary of War. No mother or widow shall be provided for at Government expense in Europe for a longer period than two weeks from the time of disembarkation in Europe to the time of reembarkation in Europe. In the case of any mother or widow willfully failing to continue the pilgrimage of her particular group, the United States shall not incur or be subject to any expense with regard to her pilgrimage after such failure.

(f) Vessels owned or operated by the United States Government or any agency thereof shall be used for transportation at sea wherever practicable.

(g) Suitable transportation, accommodations, meals, and other necessities pertaining thereto, as prescribed by the Secretary of War, shall be furnished each mother or widow included in any pilgrimage for the entire distance at sea and on land and while sojourning in Europe and while en route in the United States from home to port and from port to home. Cabin-class accommodations shall be furnished for all transportation at sea. No mother or widow shall be entitled, by reason of any payment made by or for her, to be furnished by the Government with transportation, accommodations, meals, and other necessities pertaining thereto different in kind from those prescribed by the Secretary of War for the pilgrimage of the particular group.

(h) All pilgrimages shall be made in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of War may from time to time prescribe as to the time, route, itineraries, composition of groups, accommodations, transportation, program, arrangements, management, and other matters pertaining to such pilgrimages.

SEC. 3. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act. The Secretary of War is directed to make an investigation for the purpose of determining (1) the total number of mothers and widows entitled to make the pilgrimages, (2) the number of such mothers and widows who desire to make the pilgrimages and the number who desire to make the pilgrimages during the calendar year 1930, and (3) the probable cost of the pilgrimages to be made. The Secretary of War shall report to the Congress not later than December 15, 1929, the results of such investigation.

SEC. 4. As used in this act—

(a) The term "mother" means mother, stepmother, mother through adoption, or any woman who stood in loco parentis to the deceased member of the military or naval forces for the year prior to the commencement of his service in such forces.

(b) The term "widow" means a widow who has not remarried since the death of the member of the military or naval forces.

Approved, March 2, 1929.

Without boastfulness, and in due appreciation of the fact that other States made sacrifices that were equal to those of New Jersey, we are proud of the fact that the little "garden State"—small in territory, yet mighty in its contribution to the Nation's progress—upheld in 1917 the glorious traditions that had their inception in the dark days when the struggling little colony was known as the Highway of the Revolution.

The people of the State of New Jersey will march in memory beside the mothers and widows as they make their journey to kneel beside the graves of the young Jerseymen who sleep in the national cemeteries of Europe. With them we will renew our pledges of allegiance to the ideals that carried them overseas to fight by the side of their faltering Allies and to offer up the last full measure of devotion to the country whose altruism and devotion aided in saving the civilization of the world.

Through the cooperation of Maj. Gen. B. F. Cheatham, the Quartermaster General, I am enabled to offer the following list of the resting places of New Jersey soldiers abroad, so that they may be permanently inscribed into the records of the Nation.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon a bill which I introduced.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced in Congress H. R. 3493, providing that the Government shall pay all ex-service men in cash the face value of their adjusted-service certificates. When this bill is presented to the Committee on Ways and Means, to which it has been referred for hearings thereon, I will ask the committee to amend the bill so that it will provide for the payment in cash of four-fifths of the face value of the certificates to each ex-service man desiring a cash settlement, but permitting those who desire to keep the insurance the privilege of doing so.

The World War adjusted compensation act of 1924, as it is officially entitled, provided adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War at the rate of $1.25 a day for each day of oversea service, and $1 a day for each day of home service rendered subsequently to April 5, 1917, and prior to July 1, 1919, in excess of 60 days—obviously 60 days deducted because each soldier had received $60 at time of discharge and he was required to account for it in this act. If the amount due the veteran was $50 or less, he was paid in cash; if it exceeded $50, he received from the United States Veterans' Bureau an adjusted-service certificate computed in the following manner: $1 or $1.25 per day, as above stated. Twenty-five per cent of the total amount due was added by the Government, and in addition to the 25 per cent an amount was added which was equal to approximately 4 per cent interest on the actual amount due for 20 years. If $400 was the amount due the soldier, $100 was added, making the amount $500, and what was equal to interest at the rate of 4 per cent for 20 years on $400 was also added, which increased the amount to $1,000. A certificate for that amount was delivered to the soldier, payable in 20 years, providing that a small amount may be borrowed each year—the exact amount of the adjusted-service certificate was determined by ascertaining the amount of an endowment insurance policy payable in 20 years $500 would purchase.

The law was intended to and did acknowledge a debt the Government owed its defenders. Practically 100 per cent of those in need of money have borrowed on their policies and they will continue to do so. The Government is giving the soldier 4 per cent interest for his money, but charging him 6 per cent interest compounded annually for every dollar of his own money loaned to him, never giving to him a sufficient amount in a lump sum to be of real assistance. After the initial small loan is granted, the holder of a $1,000 policy can not average more than $2 a month thereafter.

One thousand and fourteen dollars and eleven cents is the average value of the adjusted-service certificates issued by the Government to soldiers of the World War in compliance with the law of 1924.

The following figures represent what the soldier will receive if he borrows the maximum amount each year and repays none of the principal. It is based upon an assumed age of 35.

The figures are taken from information received from the U. S. Veterans' Bureau.

It will be noted that during the time the veteran is receiving $475.72 in loans, the bank or the Government, the one carrying the loan, will receive $478.28. Then the veteran is given a $46 cash settlement and he has received all that the Government has promised to pay.

The above figures represent a typical case of veterans who have been and are really in need, and the advantages and disadvantages of the law should be viewed from their viewpoint.

During the war the Canadian enlisted men were paid $33 a month, the enlisted men of New Zealand $37.50, and in Australia $45 a month.

Alien slackers and alien enemies in America made more money during the war helping to build ships and military camps than they had ever made before, and financially they were treated much better than our soldiers. One negro made $70 per day in the shipyards and also escaped military service.

The railroads were drafted into the service during the World War, but the owners were guaranteed the largest profit they had ever made in the history of railroading in America.

Property being guaranteed a handsome return, and the ship workers having received such enormous wages and escaped military service, the men who bared their breasts to enemies' bullets and brought victory to our country should likewise receive a fair return for their services. Out of the $30 or $33 our soldiers received, he was compelled to pay out of this sum $6 to $10 a month for insurance for the risk incident to his services in protecting the flag and conserving the wealth of his country. Soldiers were also compelled to make allotments of their pay to dependent relatives and, in addition to this, were compelled to pay for altering and mending their own clothing and shoes and for laundry work and other incidentals. The average soldier drew $7.50 per month after making all these payments, and with that he was required to buy Liberty bonds or be called a slacker.

Every country allied with the United States during the war paid their soldiers a liberal bonus. Canada paid her soldiers from $600 to $4,500 each. England borrowed money from the United States and paid her own soldiers a bonus of from $280 to $4,758 each. France paid her soldiers a large bonus. The United States paid $60 to each soldier as a bonus, but required them to pay it back in arriving at the amount of adjusted-service certificates.

The whole cost of war to the United States was $36,000,000,000 and eighteen billions went to make millionaires; 23,000 millionaires were made during the war, and from settlements with the Government in and immediately after the war. Thousands of men made enough money from the Government on war contracts to permit them and their families for the next five generations to live in peace and comfort and enjoy all the luxuries of this world without so much effort as the turn of the hand, while soldiers who fought in the trenches for $1.10 a day will have to work and help pay the bill.

Suppose the Government had decided to confess a debt to the veteran of $400 instead of giving him a $1,000 insurance certificate. The $400 would have been due during his service. Accept a date which is one-half way between the beginning and ending of his service and for the average soldier, it will be about January 1, 1918. If the Government will now give the soldier the $400 with interest compounded annnually at 6 per cent from January 1, 1918, the veteran will be entitled to $800 before the end of this year 1929, or four-fifths of his service certificate. Certainly it would not be unfair for the Government to pay the soldier 6 per cent for the money that the Government owes the soldier if it is fair for the soldier to pay the Government 6 per cent for his own money.

Foregn governments have received money from the United States Government for less than 1 per cent interest; the railroads and war contractors have received from the Government their billions of dollars in adjusted compensation. Shipbuilders are borrowing money from the Government for 3 per cent interest; more than $10,000,000,000 have been given to foreign countries by our Government. In view of these facts, our Government should not quibble about paying the veterans the amount confessed as due.

Many of the veterans are paying 10 per cent interest on their homes. Many do not own their own homes and the amount due, if paid, will probably cause them to be home owners. A great many could use the money to help finance their business and be helped at a time in life when they need help the most. A great majority of the ex-service men are married and have children; having come out of the service broke financially and without employment, it is a struggle for many of them to keep the home fires burning. The Government has what is to them a large sum of money; why should not at least a part of it be paid to them while they are living? It will be contended that some will spend their money foolishly. Suppose they do; it is theirs. They earned it and should have a right to spend it in any way they see fit. Why should the Government insist upon being the guardian for the soldiers and for no other class? The Government has confessed that it owes the boys the money and has confessed the amount. It is all right to give an insurance policy to those who want the insurance, but to those who need the money and do not need the insurance, an option should be given for cash settlement. Practically all of the boys are now middle-aged men and know the value of a dollar and could spend the money to a good advantage.

It will not cost the Government a great deal more to liquidate this indebtedness now rather than wait over a period of years and cause the soldier to pay out $2 for every dollar that he receives in cash.

If the insurance feature is insisted upon, the date of each policy should be changed by law to January 1, 1918, instead of January 1, 1925. Why cause the soldier to lose seven years' interest on his money?

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DUNBAR, for three days, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. MCKEOWN, for 10 days, on account of important business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—CENSUS AND REAPPORTIONMENT

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if there are any Members of this House in doubt as to their duty to-day I suggest that they read the Constitution of the United States, as well as the oath administered when they assumed office.

The Constitution provides for the taking of the census every 10 years and for the reapportionment of Members of Congress among the various States. Our oath binds us to support the Constitution.

Congress has never failed to perform its constitutional duty in so far as taking the census is concerned, but it has failed to reapportion the Members of this body among the various States, as no reapportionment measure has been passed since the taking of the census in 1920.

The State I have the honor in part to represent will, it is predicted, lose three or four Members when reapportionment takes place. Regardless of this fact, I feel it my duty to support a proper reapportionment bill. Heretofore I have voted against the reapportionment measure for the sole reason that a function delegated to the Congress by the Constitution was transferred to the executive branch of the Government. I was opposed to such action then and I am opposed to it now; but you have attached the reapportionment bill to the bill providing for the taking of the census in 1930, and rather than shirk my duty as I see it, I intend to support this bill, even though the reapportionment feature provides that the executive branch of the Government shall carry out the provisions of the Constitution in the event the Congress fails to perform its duty.

I find consolation in the fact that Congress is given ample opportunity to reapportion the membership of this body before the executive branch can act.

No Member of this body could be more vitally affected by reapportionment than I will be, as when it becomes effective my service in this body will probably terminate. I know the political situation in the city of St. Louis, and it is absolutely impossible to redistrict, place the required number of people in a district, and rearrange the lines of any district in St. Louis that will not make it 10,000 Republican.

At the present time my district is from 3,500 to 5,000 Republican, but by serving the people as I believe they desired and deserved to be served, regardless of whether they were Democrats or Republicans, I have succeeded in being elected to the Sixty-ninth and each succeeding Congress. While I deeply appreciate the loyal support of my many Republican friends, I know that I could not expect to win in an election—after reapportionment—in a district which will then be, to say the least, 10,000 Republican.

Our personal or political future should receive no thought when it interferes with the performance of our constitutional duty.

What happened here Tuesday clearly indicates what will happen when the time comes for Congress to reapportion after the taking of the 1930 census. Thinking only of their personal welfare, Members—Republican and Democratic alike—introduced and secured sufficient votes to place amendments in the bill for the registration of aliens and for the elimination of aliens from the population in making the reapportionment. Regardless of the merits of the two amendments, neither had any place in the bill. Both should be considered by committees under the proper procedure of the House and brought in as separate legislation for consideration when the question involved would be the sole issue. The constitutionality of the amendment eliminating aliens from the count when reapportionment is made has been attacked. This should be settled by a constitutional amendment.

The amendment to eliminate from consideration all persons over the age of 21 years who have been deprived of the right to vote was directed at the South, and its adoption was due solely to the attitude of southern Members in forcing objectionable amendments which affected the large cities.

I compliment the Republican leaders who secured the elimination of these amendments to-day, thus saving the bill.

I predict that Congress will never reapportion but that a deadlock will result. Therefore, if equal representation is to be secured, the only way it ever will be secured will be by the passage of the pending bill.

The large cities have been deprived of the representation to which they are entitled for nearly 10 years. St. Louis and St. Louis County, Mo., are entitled to at least four Representatives. We have but three. Kansas City alone is entitled to a Representative, but in that district Jackson County is included, one Congressman now representing nearly 400,000 people.

Failure of Congress to reapportion after the census of 1920 has resulted in over 30,000,000 being deprived of proper representation. These people reside in the cities where the population has steadily increased.

Let me cite the situation in my own State as an example. The population, by districts, as shown by the figures of the census of 1920 published in the Congressional Directory, is as follows:

First district	161,085
Second district	165,266
Third district	151,884
Fourth district	176,591
Fifth district	367,846
Sixth district	138,931
Seventh district	217,713
Eighth district	138,807
Ninth district	177,668
Tenth district	521,587
Eleventh district	210,383
Twelfth district	141,664
Thirteenth district	160,692
Fourteenth district	312,540
Fifteenth district	206,149
Sixteenth district	155,249

Those figures will be greatly changed by the 1930 census. I am sure my colleague, Mr. NIEDRINGHAUS, whose district surrounds mine, both on the north and west, is representing at this time at least 700,000 people.

The question will be asked why the State legislature has not rearranged the congressional district. The answer is simply politics.

Why has Illinois failed to redistrict since the census of 1910? This State gained two Representatives by reason of reapportionment following the census of 1910, but the two Representatives elected at large did not come from Chicago, where the population increased, but from out State. Is that fair to Chicago?

Regardless as to whether the cities or rural districts will gain by reapportionment, it should be done every 10 years as the Constitution provides. My only regret is that it is not mandatory upon the States to rearrange congressional districts so as to provide an equal number of people in each district instead of permitting States to elect at large if additional representation has been granted, and the State is not redistricted.

While a great deal of criticism has been directed at the Congress for various reasons—some warranted and others not justified—it has been more severely and I will also say more justly criticized for failing to do its constitutional duty in this respect than for any other act it might have or have not performed.

How can the Congress expect the people to obey the laws of the land when its Members refuse to do so?

Regardless of its almost certain effect on my political future, I propose to vote for the measure.

Mr. YON. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, I had not anticipated making any more remarks this special session, but I feel so disappointed, and that the South, of which my district forms a part, has been so outraged, that I can not restrain myself.

I will say in the beginning that I thought all the way since the alien amendment has been discussed that it was ill-advised, but even though it was offered and adopted I will maintain that foreigners ought to become American citizens, or the Representatives of their districts ought not want to penalize a portion of this Nation because they do not or can not for one reason or another become American citizens.

The South has since 1860 been treated first as traitors and rebels, until '65, and for 10 years thereafter prey for carpetbag politicians, and since 1875 to 80 as an Alsace and Lorraine, or even worse, for all the time that these mentioned Provinces were lost to France there was an eternal hope always burning in the breast of their inhabitants that they some day would be reclaimed by that nation, and this hope became a reality in 1918. But what of the South? You have insisted, you, the majority of the Northeast, Northwest, and North, that we have passed laws that would prevent, on account of race, to them the right of suffrage; and in so far as the rest of the Southern States are concerned—I know not but as for mine—I do know that is the same suffrage requirements for all and all color; that is, 21 years or over, poll tax paid, and registered according to law, for white, black, red, or yellow.

But it is amusing now to observe the party mechanism of my State, of the Republican Party endeavoring to kick out the negro, and you in the North denouncing we people of the South for endeavoring to maintain the supremacy of our race. How are you going to permit your party leaders to raise up a white man's party in Florida, thereby casting aside your child, and the charge you have so scrupulously undertaken to care for, and at the same receive him as a brother, with open arms north of the Mason and Dixon line? Is the negro of the North any better than the negro down South? I say not; for the negro of the old South, cared for and nurtured by the people that knows his nature, and whom he has lived with for over 300 years, is the best cared for and protected of all the colored race. This amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] is grossly unfair and unjust. He might feel that the negro down South has been treated unjustly, but has he visited down South? If not, I invite him down to my State and district and will let him see.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, the so-called Tinkham amendment adopted by the committee during the consideration of the census-apportionment bill on June 4, 1929, as shown by page 2364 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, is in violation of both the spirit and letter of the Constitution of the United States and is a serious invasion of the sovereignty of the States of the Union. The amendment provides that, in showing the whole number of persons in each State, inhabitants in each State over 21 years of age and citizens of the United States whose right to vote has been denied or abridged, except for rebellion or other crime, shall be excluded.

The language is substantially the language of section 2 of the fourteenth amendment. This section, dealing with apportionment and the right to vote, was changed and virtually repealed by the adoption of the fifteenth amendment, as well as by the adoption of the nineteenth amendment, which provides that the right of citizens to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex.

The agitation of the amendment by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] can serve no good purpose. It is intended to promote racial and sectional strife and discord. It is calculated to perpetuate sectionalism.

THIRTEENTH, FOURTEENTH, AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS

The Civil War resulted in the abolishment of slavery. The thirteenth amendment forever prohibits slavery and involuntary servitude. In the reconstruction period following the War between the States, when passions, prejudices, and sectional feelings were high, Congress endeavored to grant the right of franchise to negroes. Section 1 of the fourteenth amendment provides that all persons born or naturalized in the United States are citizens. It defines due process and gives to all the equal protection of the laws. Section 2 of the fourteenth amendment undertook to grant the negro the right to vote, and to reduce apportionment if the right is abridged or denied, except for rebellion or other crime. The power has never been exercised by Congress, and a study of the debates in the Senate and the House at the time of the submission of the fourteenth amendment clearly shows that the purpose of the proponents would not be accomplished by the adoption of the amendment.

Section 3 of the fourteenth amendment prescribes disqualification of officers, which may be removed by Congress. This section is of little importance, as Congress by the act of June 6, 1898, removed the disabilities.

Sections 4 and 5 of the fourteenth amendment deal with the public debt and authorize Congress to enforce the provisions of the amendment.

It was conceded that the fourteenth amendment was not effective to confer suffrage on the negroes of the South. Thereupon the fifteenth amendment was adopted, and it provides that the right of citizens to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

It is well to keep in mind that section 2 of the fourteenth amendment deals with the denial of the right to vote to "male inhabitants." Undoubtedly the nineteenth amendment, conferring upon women the right to vote, repeals this provision, if it had not already been repealed by the fifteenth amendment. I maintain that section 2 is now inoperative and was changed by the fifteenth amendment.

The so-called Tinkham amendment is a boomerang. Its adoption is a Pyrrhic victory. It can do Mississippi no more harm than it can Massachusetts.

The thirteenth amendment, while it abolished slavery, did not confer upon the negro the right of suffrage.

The fourteenth amendment made the negro a citizen of the United States, with all the privileges and immunities of a citizen, but the right of suffrage was not given. That is left to the control of the States.

The Supreme Court, in repeated decisions, has held that the right of suffrage is not "a privilege or immunity," and that the amendment does not vest suffrage in the negro or anyone else. Under the terms of the second section, the right is recognized as belonging absolutely to the States. The thirteenth and fourteenth amendments left unchanged the exclusive jurisdiction of the States respecting the exercise of the right to vote. Under section 2 of the fourteenth amendment the South retained the right to disfranchise the negro. The option was given of either permitting him to vote or suffering reduction in Congress. This section was very offensive to some Republicans, like Senator Sumner, of Massachusetts. It was offensive, because it conferred on the States of the South the power to disfranchise the negro. The Southern States refused to confer suffrage on the negro. They declined the offered bribe of complete representation in Congress, and thereupon the fifteenth amendment was submitted on February 27, 1869, and it was intended as a settlement of the question of negro suffrage in the South. Until the fifteenth amendment was adopted the States had absolute control of suffrage. By the adoption of this amendment that control is still retained, subject to the condition that the right to vote shall not be denied or abridged "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The fifteenth amendment did not confer the right of suffrage. It did prevent discrimination.

EDUCATIONAL AND PROPERTY QUALIFICATIONS

At the time of the adoption of the three amendments mentioned it was conceded by all that any State could impose property or educational qualifications, and that this might practically deprive negroes of the right of suffrage. No one doubted that such a procedure would be perfectly permissible upon the adoption of the said amendments. Congress repeatedly refused to prohibit discrimination for any purpose except "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The States now have exclusive jurisdiction of suffrage, subject only to the inhibition of the fifteenth amendment.

The State of Massachusetts about 1855 amended its constitution so as to provide educational or intelligence qualifications. A similar provision still obtains in the constitution of that State. The purpose was to exclude aliens. There are similar provisions in Connecticut and Vermont.

More than one-third of the States to-day have educational qualifications. If an educational qualification such as exists in Mississippi and other States is an abridgment of the right to vote, then the Representatives in all those States, including the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, would be proportionately reduced.

The educational qualification is an abridgment of the right to vote. The requirement of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts that voters must pay taxes is an abridgment. In fact, section 2 of the fourteenth amendment is abortive. If the Tinkham amendment is retained in the pending bill, it will operate to exclude all those in Massachusetts and in other States whose right to vote is denied or abridged by educational or property qualifications.

Moreover, section 2 of the fourteenth amendment is a penalizing section. It is not a suffrage-conferring section. If it were, the word "male" would not have been eliminated by the nineteenth amendment. Those who live in glass houses can not throw stones. The narrow, partisan, and prejudiced view advanced by the gentleman from Massachusetts falls on unsympathetic ears. Neither the race problem nor any other great national question can be settled in prejudice or malice.

UNDERSTANDING CLAUSE

Section 244 of the constitution of Mississippi, adopted in 1890, provides "that every elector shall be able to read any section in the constitution of the State; or shall be able to understand the same when read to him, or give a reasonable interpretation thereof." Substantially the same amendment had obtained in the constitutions of Massachusetts and other New England States for more than 40 years. The purpose of the provision was to correct the abuse of an ignorant and debased suffrage. The provision was adopted by Mississippi after a study of the constitutions of other States. Mississippi had jurisdiction in the exercise of the right of suffrage. Every man and every woman can vote in Mississippi on the reading test alone who can vote in the State of Connecticut, and many men and women can vote in Mississippi on the educational test alone who can vote in Massachusetts, because Massachusetts requires them to be able to write their names, as well as read. Those who are denied the right to vote in Massachusetts because of this qualification will be excluded along with the citizens of Mississippi who can not vote on account of a much easier qualification, under the Tinkham amendment.

In more than one-third of the States of the Union those who are prevented from voting on account of educational or property qualifications, such as obtain in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Vermont, would likewise be excluded if the Tinkham amendment is retained.

MISSISSIPPI CONSTITUTION AGREEABLE TO FEDERAL CONSTITUTION

The understanding clause of the Mississippi constitution has been reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States. It was approved in the case of Williams v. Mississippi (170 U. S. 213, 47 L. Ed. 1012). Similar provisions in the other 11 Southern States composing the Confederacy have been approved by the Supreme Court. The so-called grandfather clauses in the constitution of Oklahoma and in the statutes of Maryland were declared unconstitutional because in violation of the fifteenth amendment. Guinn v. United States (238 U. S. 347); Myers v. Anderson (238 U. S. 368).

The primary election law of Texas was declared unconstitutional at the October term, 1926, because of the violation of the amendment.

These cases clearly establish the right of suffrage in the States. They also clearly prove the right to impose qualifications and conditions requisite to its exercise, provided they do not discriminate on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH recently made the statement in substance:

> I have gone through the laws of the Southern States and I am unable to find that they in any wise nullify the fifteenth amendment.

SECTION 2 OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT REPEALED BY THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT

Under section 2 of the fourteenth amendment the right of the States to deny suffrage was expressly recognized. The penalty was reduced apportionment. The fifteenth amendment was intended to prevent discrimination against the negro. Its adoption repealed said section 2. By adopting the fifteenth amendment the South was deprived of the alternative furnished by said section 2 of the fourteenth amendment. This view is maintained by all the well-considered opinions of the most thoughtful students, and it is found in the proceedings of Congress upon the submission of the amendments.

The principle is fully established that where rights are withdrawn to the exercise of which penalties are attached, the penalties disappear with the withdrawal of the rights. When the fifteenth amendment destroyed vital rights theretofore enjoyed by the States, the attaching penalty of the fourteenth amendment disappeared.

The fifteenth amendment destroyed vital rights previously enjoyed by the States and the attaching penalty of reduced apportionment disappeared.

If the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts remains, the exclusions in Massachusetts and other States will be as large as the exclusions in Mississippi. The qualifications for voting in the two States are quite similar. The Southern States stand on an equal footing with other States. They will not be intimidated by threats. They will not be moved by criticism. They will not permit a debased, debauched, and corrupt suffrage. The suffrage provisions of the Southern States are similar to those contained in many other States, and if there are any violations of the Constitution, the citizen had his remedy. It is silly to give census enumerators the right to pass upon suffrage or other constitutional questions.

The States of the South have equal rights and equal responsibilities with the other States of the Union. All of the States are the sole judges of the qualifications of their voters. Mississippi and the other Southern States stand for the Constitution. The suffrage provisions of their constitutions have been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. If the right to vote is denied the negro, it is likewise denied to the white man, and for the same reason. There is no discrimination. Neither ignorance nor prejudice can obscure truth and obstruct justice.

I quote from Bryant on the Constitution of the United States, page 333:

> The fourteenth amendment is prohibitory upon the States only, and the legislation authorized to be adopted by Congress is not direct legislation on the matter respecting which the States are prohibited from making or enforcing certain laws or doing certain acts, but is corrective legislation, such as may be necessary or proper for counteracting or redressing such laws.

The prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment are directed against the States, and they are restrictive of State power.

I have quoted substantially from Eleventh Federal Statutes, Annotated, page 1096, and I now quote the Supreme Court of the United States as found in Third Federal Statutes, Annotated, page 109:

> Until some State law has been passed or some State action through its officers or agents has been taken adverse to the rights of the citizens sought to be protected by the fourteenth amendment, no legislation of the United States under said amendment, nor any proceeding under such legislation can be called into activity for the prohibitions of the amendment are against State laws and acts done under State authority.

James G. Blaine was a Member of both the House and Senate during the reconstruction period, and at the time of the submission and passage of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, and I quote from his Twenty Years of Congress. Mr. Blaine said:

> Its prime object was to correct the wrongs which might be enacted in the South, and the correction proposed was direct and unmistakable—namely, that the Nation would exclude the negro from the basis of apportionment whenever the States should exclude him from the right of suffrage.

I further quote from Mr. Blaine:

> When, therefore, the Nation by subsequent change in its Constitution declared that the State shall not exclude the negro from the right of suffrage, it neutralized and surrendered the contingent right before held to exclude him from the basis of apportionment.

Again Mr. Blaine says:

> Congress is thus plainly deprived, by the fifteenth amendment, of certain powers over the representation in the South which it previously possessed under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment. Before the adoption of the fifteenth amendment if a State should exclude the negro from suffrage, the next step would be for Congress to exclude the negro from the basis of apportionment. After the adoption of the fifteenth amendment if a State should exclude the negro from suffrage, the next step would be for the Supreme Court to declare that the act was unconstitutional and therefore null and void.

The conclusion is inevitable that the fifteenth amendment certainly changed and virtually repealed the second section of the fourteenth amendment.

CONCLUSION

The fifteenth amendment gives Congress no power to legislate against individuals. The prohibition is confined to the United States and the States. States act through their judicial, executive, and legislative departments. Watson, on the Constitution, says, quoting many authorities to sustain him:

> The fifteenth amendment has reference only to acts of the United States and States and not to any action of private individuals.

It left the power to determine the qualifications of voters to the several States.

It is conceded that suffrage is for the States and that there can be no discrimination "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The constitution of Mississippi makes no discrimination. Its understanding provisions are substantially those that obtain in Massachusetts and other States.

If any State constitutions or any election laws discriminate against the negro, they are held null and void by the Supreme Court.

By the adoption of an amendment to the pending bill the House has to-day eliminated the Tinkham amendment. It was really subject to a point of order. It is unconstitutional. While it is substantially the language of section 2 of the fourteenth amendment, it is the language that has been repealed by the fifteenth amendment.

There is no necessity for any further suffrage legislation by Congress. Protection is accorded to all under the Constitution of the United States, to which the constitutions of Mississippi and other Southern States conform.

TINKERING WITH RACE HATRED

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, during the present consideration of the census reapportionment bill we have had some more "tinkering" with the race question, with the usual resultant injury to the colored people.

Since I came to Congress I have discussed this question rather fully on several occasions and shall content myself at this time with only a very few observations.

The Negro race is in the minority in this country and will always constitute a very small fraction of our population, and therefore can only secure and keep such rights and privileges as the majority determines the colored race is worthy to enjoy. The white man will determine what the negro is to receive, and the negro can not determine what he will demand and take contrary to the wishes of the white man. This can not be otherwise, and for these reasons it is for the best interest of the negro that only those things be done that will create and perpetuate the good will of the white man for the colored race. The white race can not and will not like the colored race with the negro as a race hating the white man.

That which causes a better feeling of each race for the other is worth while, and especially is this sympathy of real value to the colored race. The negro suffers because of race hatred much more than the white man.

It naturally follows that whatever is done either in Congress or out of Congress to engender race hatred is a part and parcel of the ultimate destruction of the good will which is so essential to the protection of the colored people. If the propagandists, both white and colored, in the press and out of the press, who are all the while saying mean things about the white race and unfairly urging the colored people that they are being mistreated, are bringing about a more sympathetic understanding, then they are patriots, but if not, then they are the negro's worst enemies and the Nation's worst traitors. If such "tinkering" with the race question as has just taken place causes better race understanding, then it is well, but if it causes race hatred, as I firmly believe it does, then it should not take place for political purposes or for any other cause.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the Chair has sustained a point of order to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH]; and the decision of the Chair having been appealed from, I have voted with the majority and that decision has stood.

I can not let the occasion pass without an emphatic protest of disapproval of the reason stated by the Chairman for his decision. I am convinced that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas to define and limit the word "persons," as used in the bill and the Constitution, to exclude aliens, is an attack upon and attempt to subvert the Constitution and for that reason was out of order. I can not agree with the statement of the Chair that in administering the rules of the House and applying them to parliamentary procedure he can close his eyes to the statute law and much less to that fundamental law, the Constitution, which we have solemnly sworn as Members of this body to "preserve, protect, and defend." If it were not for the plain violation of the Constitution, the amendment offered would be germane to the bill before us, as is obvious from the unanswerable arguments of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] and by reference to the Manual of Legislative Procedure, of which he is the author, pages 124 to 132.

The failure of the Congress since 1920 to fulfill its constitutional duty to reapportion the membership of the House will, of course, justify overriding all technicalities in efforts to right the wrong being done to representative government. However, since rulings on points of order serve as precedents for future rulings, it seems best to know that one or more Members in voting to sustain the ruling of the Chair believed the reason given to be as untenable as the ruling itself was correct.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, on April 15, 1929, I raised my right hand in this House of Representatives and took the following oath, which you, sir, administered to me:

> I do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office upon which I am about to enter. So help me God.

To-day I have an opportunity to show how much I love the Constitution of the United States. I have an opportunity to show whether my devotion to it is a rope of sand or whether I bear true faith and allegiance to it.

I believe the Constitution of the United States is the greatest chart of liberty ever struck from the brain and conscience of man. It brought us out of the darkness of bondage into the white light of freedom. To it we owe all that we are and all that we can ever hope to be. It guarantees to us and to our contemporaries the dignity of free men and women and it is the sheet anchor of safety to countless millions yet unborn.

In a brief span of two decades we have seen the map of the earth change. Thrones have tottered, dynasties have crumbled, the doctrine of the divine right of kings has been shot to death on a hundred battle fields, but in all of this tumult that has rocked the world our Government has remained serenely stable and secure, because the Constitution of the United States is founded on God's eternal justice.

Believing these things as I do, I can not help realizing how serious is any situation, how deplorable is any trend of action or inaction, that opens a breach in our Constitution.

Such a breach has been started by the failure of Congress to obey the plain mandate of the Constitution in the matter of congressional reapportionment. To my mind the lapse of Congress in this respect is the most tragic dereliction on a large scale in the history of America. I doubt whether Members of Congress who have staved off reapportionment year after year realize the meaning of their course against the security of the country which we all love. They have been like wayward children, recreant to parental love and unmindful of the hand that feeds them. Some have been so blind they are unable to see the effect of their actions. I hesitate to say that others were motivated by unbridled selfishness, but circumstantial evidence is against them. Because, forsooth, their States were likely to lose a paltry Representative or two in Congress they were willing to stop the machinery of the Constitution itself. When we think of the consequences of their conduct, actual and possible, how fatuous, how awful their error becomes! How can Members of Congress denounce the disrespect of law that unfortunately exists in America when we violate the Constitution ourselves?

Mr. Speaker, the Constitution stands, or nothing else matters. Therefore when we twist it or warp it or sap its strength, we sin unpardonably against human society. That is what I fear Congress has been doing for eight or nine long years, or since the census of 1920 was taken. The very first article in the Constitution—Article I—says:

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States and within every subsequent term of 10 years.

This is a constitutional mandate that ought to be binding on Congress. It ought to be accepted as being automatically operative, so that every 10 years, just after the decennial census statistics are ascertained, the national lawmaking body will proceed to fix the unit of reapportionment and certify it to the States. For 120 years in our solemn history this provision of the Constitution actually was binding on Congress, and automatically operative, but after the census of 1920 a strange obsession came over our lawmakers. They balked. They knew that public sentiment would not stand for any increase in the size of the House, which already is too large by at least 100 Members. They knew that any increase over the present membership of 435 would mean an unwieldy House, in which individual responsibility would be submerged; a House incapable of working efficiently, in addition to being an enormous burden on the taxpayers. An impasse in the size of the House having been reached, the alternatives were reduced representation of a number of States or no apportionment legislation at all. Congress took the latter horn of the dilemma and scrapped the Constitution for eight long years, and meanwhile time and shifting currents of population have worked almost unbelievable inequalities of representation in Congress and the Electoral College, so that now we have the amazing spectacle of one Member of Congress representing 1,500,000 souls, and others representing fewer than 150,000; with an Electoral College so much out of joint that, like a bad meter, it is likely, if we do not look out, to register a President that we never intended to elect at all!

Mr. Speaker, the stalemate caused by this remarkable—and, to my mind, indefensible—disregard of the constitutional mandate will end within a few minutes when we pass the congressional reapportionment bill which the Senate has sent over to us. It has been said to me that I ought not to vote for this bill because under it Indiana will lose two Members of Congress. I would vote for it if a reapportionment based, as is this bill, on absolute equalities should lose Indiana 10 Members of Congress instead of 2, because I love my country and I believe the Constitution should be inviolable, for without the Constitution we can have no country worthy of the name. To defer apportionment legislation would mean nothing from Indiana's standpoint. There never will come a time when Indiana would not lose, and it would be a crime to continue to murder the Constitution while we chase an ignis fatuus like that.

Mr. Speaker, this reapportionment bill may retire me from Congress and send me back to the press gallery, where, as James Whitcomb Riley would say, I used to be "So happy and so poor." It will mean a general redistricting of Indiana, and in all probability the redistricting will be done by our Republican friends, who may not hesitate to run the scalpel into my Democratic vitals; but that will be all right. The country can survive the loss of my services, but it can not stand any further impairment of the Constitution.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, under the rule for extension I desire to submit the following, relative to the passage, and my vote thereon, of the combined census and apportionment bills:

Criticism of the combination of these two measures, each as a crutch for the other, would be very pertinent, but probably bootless. I shall therefore content myself with giving certain reasons for my support—first, of the two amendments which were adopted by a substantial majority in the Committee of the Whole.

First, the Rankin amendment, which in laying out a basis for apportionment of the Congressmen to the several States all aliens were to be excluded. That included, first, Chinese and Japanese, neither of whom can ever become citizens of the United States; second, persons who have come to this country and have neither shown inclination nor effort to become citizens of this country, and whose allegiance lies toward the country from which they came, and the sovereigns of their natal countries would be the powers to whom they would resort for protection if they should become involved in any way with our laws.

The large number of Chinese and Japanese are on the Pacific coast, there being nearly enough in the State of California to give it, as they will have under the bill now, an additional Representative. And yet not one of them could vote for a Congressman.

The other class come from many countries and are found in the great cities of the East and West and those large centers touching the Great Lakes. We have comparatively few of these in Nebraska. The foreign born among the district made up of those coming from the British Isles, Scandinavian countries, Germany, Czechoslovakia, and other northern European countries have nearly all made strong efforts, and usually successful, to become naturalized as American citizens.

This is true to a large extent in Iowa, the Dakotas, Minnesota, rural Missouri, and rural Illinois and Indiana. These States and divisions being those with the lowest rate of illiteracy will lose under this bill about one-half of the total loss in the country, which is 23.

The second amendment was the Tinkham amendment, which would have deprived a number of the Southern States of about 35 Members of the House under the constitutional provision that any States denying its citizens the right of suffrage should lose proportional representation in Congress.

These two amendments would not only have not deprived Nebraska of one Representative, but if the alien amendment were carried through it would leave Nebraska with the six congressional districts she has now. The Tinkham amendment remaining in would have given Nebraska at least seven Members.

The members of the Nebraska delegation in the House had supported these amendments, and were ready to vote for the measure as the bill had been amended when the time came. Overnight there were many changes of mind in the membership of the House. In the exercise of that prerogative I did not participate, but in any event these two amendments were later voted out of the bill. I, for one, while I was in favor of a census bill, and the bill, as agreed upon, so far as it relates to the census was satisfactory, did not propose by my vote to surrender Nebraska's right to fair representation in the House and the Electoral College in the interest of those States which had large numbers of people who, under the bill, would be counted to make representation but in the matter of citizenship, including voting, they were entirely devoid of any rights.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. FENN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 7, 1929, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

30. Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation amounting to $3,000,000 for beginning the municipal center in the District of Columbia (H. 625. By Mr. CULLEN: Petition of the National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners, stating that they are unalterably opposed to any enlargement of Federal authority by the creation of new agencies or the enlargement of the authority of present agencies whereby the regulatory authority of the State commissions would be interfered with in a field where they are now adequately functioning; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

626. Also, petition of the United Swiss Societies of Greater New York, requesting that the immigration restriction should be kept at the present quota limitations or even increased beyond that, and that the United States Congress and the President of the United States should be urged to change and modify proposed quota restrictions, thereby increasing the quota to permit at least as many immigrants from Switzerland as are permitted under the present quota restriction; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

627. By Mr. GARBER of Oklahoma: Petition of Cecil Munn, president Enid Terminal Elevator Co., Enid, Okla., indorsing House bill 17165, to create a department of education; to the Committee on Education.

628. By Mr. O'CONNELL of New York: Petition of the National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners, opposing any enlargement of Federal authority by the creation of new agencies or the enlargement of the authority of present agencies whereby the regulatory authority of the State commissioners would be interfered with in a field where they are now adequately functioning; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

629. Also, petition of the United Swiss Societies of Greater New York, with reference to the national-origins plan; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

SENATE

FRIDAY, June 7, 1929

(Legislative day of Tuesday, June 4, 1929)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 312) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 3083) to amend subsection (a) of section 26 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended by the settlement of war claims act of 1928, so as to authorize the allocation of the unallocated interest fund in accordance with the records of the Alien Property Custodian, and it was signed by the Vice President.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. BURTON. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. SCHALL. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is ill.

Mr. HEFLIN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BLACK] is detained from the Senate by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

CHANGE IN DATE OF INAUGURATION

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 3) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments which were agreed to May 6, 1929.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into day before yesterday, at the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the unfinished business has been temporarily laid aside, and there has been taken from the calendar and laid before the Senate the joint resolution, known as the Norris amendment to the Constitution, providing for a change in the time of the meeting of Congress and the time of the inauguration of the President of the United States.

This amendment has been debated in recent years, chiefly on the floor of the House during the last session. Since I have been a Member of the Senate it came up early in the Sixty-ninth Congress, was reported out of committee among the very first measures to be considered, was placed early on the calendar and with less than an hour's debate the proposed amendment to the Constitution was adopted so far as the Senate could do so. In the Seventieth Congress a similar procedure was followed without any hearings being held by the committee; again, early in the session, before the new Members of the Senate were entirely familiar with the situation, it was once more made the business of the Senate, and with less than an hour's debate was passed by a very large majority. It now comes before us under similar circumstances, early in the session of the Seventy-first Congress, and we are informed that there is no great necessity for debating it, the reasons having all been given previously.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the last time it was really debated on the floor of the Senate was in March, 1924, more than five years ago, and since then the complexion of the Senate has changed, so that 45 Senators who were here at that time are now no longer in the Senate; in other words, 45 Members of this body to-day have really never listened to a debate on the subject, unless we call a "debate" the few minutes given to it in the early days of the Sixty-ninth and Seventieth Congresses, when it was "debated" for perhaps three-quarters of an hour or less.

I know that those who have already recorded themselves as being in favor of the joint resolution are not likely to change their votes. We, all of us, hate to be accused of inconsistency.

When any one of us has had occasion in the past to take a different attitude on a public question from that which was previously announced it has always been a source of embarrassment. It has frequently been held against us by our enemies or those desirous of confusing us that we have changed our views. As a matter of fact, several Senators have changed their views on the amendment from time to time, two or three of those first voting against it having been converted to vote in favor of it, and two or three of those voting for it having been converted to vote against it. In the last Congress, in March, 1928, Mr. President, it was made the regular order of business in the House of Representatives which had not previously voted upon this proposed amendment, although it had been passed by the Senate on several occasions. A debate lasting three days was held. The debate was considered of sufficient importance to be printed as a special House document (No. 331, 70th Cong., 1st sess.), in which the proceedings and the debate occupy some 87 pages, taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The House of Representatives, after a three days' debate, refused to give the necessary two-thirds vote. Two hundred and nine Members voted for the joint resolution and 133 voted against it. Of the 133 who voted against it, 24 are no longer Members of the House of Representatives. I suppose the advocates of this measure would be inclined to say that one of the reasons why they were not returned was that they ventured to vote against the joint resolution proposing the constitutional amendment; but, as a matter of fact, Mr. President, of the 209 who voted for the measure 36 were not returned; so if there is anything in that argument more of those who voted for the joint resolution were not returned than of those who voted against it.

Of the present Members of the House of Representatives only 173 are actually recorded as favoring the proposed amendment, and it is very doubtful whether the pending joint resolution can now pass the House of Representatives, because obviously almost one-third of the present Members of the House are opposed to it. Fewer than half of the Members of the House actually voted for it the last time it came before Congress.

Consequently, Mr. President, it seems to me a little strange that those in favor of the joint resolution, instead of again attempting to secure an amendment to the Constitution, should not have introduced a bill providing for the change by law. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to change the date of the meeting of Congress. According to the Constitution, Congress meets on the first Monday in December unless that date is changed by a vote of the Congress.

It is obvious that the proponents of the change have a majority who would vote with them here in the Senate, and it is quite likely they could secure a majority vote in the other House, if the last vote on the joint resolution proposing the submission of the amendment is any criterion as to what the House would do.

It has been stated, however, on the floor of the Senate by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the author of this proposed amendment to the Constitution, that it is doubtful whether such an act changing the time of the meeting of Congress would be constitutional. The reason he gives for that contention is that the Constitution, according to the Senator from Nebraska, provides for a 2-year term for Members of the House of Representatives, for a 6-year term for Members of the Senate, and a 4-year term for President, and that, therefore, any act of Congress changing the date of meeting of Congress would change the length of those terms and therefore would be unconstitutional.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is mistaken when he states that I argued that the changing by Congress of the date of meeting of Congress would be unconstitutional. I have never made that kind of argument.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, Mr. President; the Senator from Nebraska misunderstood me. According to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the Senator from Nebraska said the other day that anything which would change the length of the term of Members of the House of Representatives would be unconstitutional.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but that is entirely different from what the Senator just stated as being my position. I agree to that.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is what I endeavored to say. I am sorry I did not make myself entirely plain. Anything, however, that proposes to change the term of Members of the House of Representatives by shortening it or, I presume, by lengthening it, would be unconstitutional. I assume the Senator from Nebraska so holds.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. BLEASE. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether or not he thinks that what the Senator from Nebraska is attempting to accomplish can be accomplished by act of Congress?

Mr. BINGHAM. I think so, and I shall take a few moments in endeavoring to show that. Furthermore, I should like to show why the argument of the Senator from Nebraska in regard to the length of the term of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives is not tenable.

In the first place, there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which provides that the term of a Member of the House shall be two years. In the second place, there is nothing in the Constitution which provides that the term of a Senator shall be six years. In the third place, there is something in the Constitution which provides that the term of the President shall be four years. Where the Constitution refers to the election of Members of the House it provides that they shall be elected every second year; where it refers to the election of Members of the Senate it provides that they shall be elected for six years. It does not, however, say that they shall be elected for a term of six years; but where the Constitution refers to the President, it provides, in so many words, that he shall be elected for a term of four years. It is therefore obvious, Mr. President, that, in view of the fact that the Constitution specifically provides that the date when Congress shall be convened may be changed by Congress, it was not in the minds of the fathers when they wrote the Constitution that that provision should not be carried out, due to the fact that Members of the House have a certain definite term of two years and the Members of the Senate a certain definite term of six years. Had they so intended, the words "term of" would have been used in each of those cases, as they were used in the case of the President, and no provision would have been made for changing it after it had once become established.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator yield to have a conference committee appointed?

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope, Mr. President, any such action will not be taken out of my time or out of the time allowed to the discussion of this subject.

Mr. NORRIS. It will either come out of the Senator's time or the time of somebody else.

Mr. BINGHAM. I did not ask that it be taken out of my time. I did not want it to come out of the time allotted to this subject, which is one hour.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has half of the time, and the remainder of the time is divided amongst all of us. If it shall not come out of the Senator's time, it will out of somebody else's time.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BLEASE. I merely wish to say that I think the Senator from Connecticut is absolutely correct in his view, and I have heard a great many others who have studied this question very thoroughly say that they thought what the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is attempting to accomplish could be accomplished by act of Congress.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, no serious effort to accomplish this change by resolution was made for a long time, although in 1808 a resolution was presented providing that the Congress should sit but for one year and that the term should expire on the first Tuesday in April. In 1840 a resolution declaring December 1 as the commencement of the term of Members was proposed. From 1889, however, until 1928, 93 attempts have been made to change the beginning and ending of the terms of Congress. Obviously there is not time at my disposal to describe those attempts further than to say that a considerable number of them had to do with an effort to change the Constitution.

Mr. President, a great many efforts to change the Constitution have been made from time to time; they run up into the hundreds. Except for the first 10 amendments, which were adopted almost at the time the Constitution was adopted, only 9 of them have been successful. Of those nine, I know that many Senators who come from south of Mason and Dixon's line feel that at least two were inadvisable and were adopted under the excitement following the Civil War and might to advantage have been worded differently. Of the others, the people of my State, by not accepting them, have shown that they did not believe the amendments were wise; in fact, the people of Connecticut are rather proud of the fact that Connecticut was one of the two States which did not accept the eighteenth amendment, believing that it had no place in the Constitution, and was one of the three States which did not accept the amendment giving to Congress the power to lay and collect taxes without apportionment among the several States of the Union.

Be that as it may, however, Mr. President, we are actually asked to propose to the people of the United States, through their State legislatures, a change in the Constitution which virtually is merely a mechanical change in the operation of the Congress, a change in the date of its meeting. The people of the United States are not greatly interested in this subject. Those of them who have thought about it know that the Constitution provides that the Congress might make a change itself if, in its wisdom, it should decide to do so.

Furthermore, they know that one of the principal reasons for this change is held to be the prevention of filibusters in the short session. Mr. President, filibusters in the short session have frequently prevented the passage of legislation, but I think it is generally agreed that more good than harm has resulted by the use of filibusters for that purpose. Whenever, however, a majority of the Senate, in its wisdom, decides that the filibuster shall no longer prevail, and that the will of the majority shall prevail, at any time it is perfectly possible for a majority of the Members of this body, by a change in its rules, to introduce majority cloture; and when majority cloture shall be introduced there will be an end of all filibustering, as everybody knows; so that it is not necessary for an amendment to the Constitution to be adopted in order to secure majority cloture and an end of filibustering.

Furthermore, everyone knows that when both Houses of Congress decide, by a majority vote, to change the date on which the Congress assembles, it can be done. It is provided for in the Constitution. On the other hand, Mr. President, the arrangement under which we have been operating is distinctly to our advantage.

The argument has been advanced, both in the House of Representatives and on the floor of the Senate, that one of the strong reasons for changing it was to give an opportunity for us to become more like foreign nations in our parliamentary procedure. It is said that we are the only country in the world which follows the extraordinary practice of not having the Congress actually forced to assemble until 13 months after the date of the election. The cases of France, England, Germany, Poland, Austria, Hungary, Australia, Argentina, Brazil, and many other countries have been cited in the debates in the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, perhaps I may be pardoned for thinking that there is nothing in their legislative history to lead us to believe that they have passed any better laws than we have. No one will pretend that they are enjoying any greater prosperity than we are; no one can believe that their people are enjoying any more happiness or any more peace than the United States has enjoyed during the past 122 years when we have been following the existing practice. Furthermore, the fact that they do not provide for this practice in their constitutions would seem to me, Mr. President, with all respect, to be an argument why they should adopt our system rather than why we should adopt their system. What greater advantages have they to offer, as a result of having followed a different system, which should persuade us to change ours? None have been mentioned here, so far as I know.

Mr. President, it has been suggested that we ought not to let the "lame ducks" have a chance to say what shall be the law of the country. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the Constitution has been frequently referred to as the "lame duck" amendment. A wag in the House at one time said it was better to have laws passed by "lame ducks" than by "unhatched eggs." Of course, that is neither an argument one way nor the other.

Mr. President, who are the "lame ducks" who have taken part in legislation in the House after they have been either defeated at the polls or not elected to a new term? In the debate in the House Mr. UNDERHILL gave a list of some of the more distinguished of them. They included some of the most distinguished Members of this body, including the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], former Senator New, and former Senator John W. Weeks. They included also Mr. Everett Sanders, "Uncle Joe" Cannon, William McKinley; and, to come down to very recent times, Ogden Mills. No one will pretend, Mr. President, that the country suffered from having them serve as legislators while they were "lame ducks." As a matter of fact, they did their duty just as well during the last session when they were in the House as before. It is quite obvious that some others might be more inclined to vote according as their own judgments dictated and less inclined to vote according to the popular will of the moment by reason of the fact that they could act entirely independently, and that, no matter how they voted or spoke, the result would be the same for them at the end of the session.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the reason for our present system is that this Government is not a pure democracy; but it is a Republic based on a representative system of government. The countries of the world have been more and more tending to become pure democracies. This amendment is a distinct effort on the part of those who favor that system to enable this country to come nearer to being a pure democracy.

It has been stated over and over again that the reason for this amendment was to permit the people to have a more direct influence on legislation, in order that as soon as they elected a Member of Congress he might carry out their wishes.

Mr. President, I know that that is a very popular theory; but I venture to assert that the success of this Government during the past century and a quarter has been due in large measure to the fact that we are not a pure democracy; that our ancestors, having seen the obstacles to the success of pure democracy as laid down by such writers as Aristotle and others from time immemorial, did not adopt that system of government, but did adopt the representative system of government.

In a representative system the people of a community elect or select those men whom they know and believe to be representative citizens, whom they can trust to spend time in studying the new laws proposed, in studying the old laws now in existence, in studying the operation of their government, and in acting upon those studies. Our theory of government is not that a Senator or a Representative is elected directly to go to the Congress and carry out the direction of people back home who have no time to study the great mass of laws that are presented. We are not here simply as the mouthpiece of the electorate, to carry out their wishes willy-nilly. According to the theory on which this Government was founded, we are here to exercise our own judgment, and, after careful study, vote as we believe to be right. We are selected because the people at home believe that we are capable of exercising good judgment under the circumstances, and, having carefully studied the laws which are proposed for passage, to use the best of our judgment in adopting them.

That may sound strange to some ears. It may sound like a very old-fashioned theory, but it is the theory on which this Government has been run, and it has been successful; and I believe it to be one of the reasons why our form of government—a government of the people, by the people, and for the people—has been more successful than any other popular government the world has ever seen.

Hundreds of years ago Aristotle pointed out the dangers that came when the people directed the government; when pure democracy, swept off its feet by the eloquence of some demagogue or some popular orator, would adopt a measure which the wiser heads knew was not for the interest of the country. Consequently, Mr. President, this very thing in the Constitution, our very practice, has led to a situation making it easier for us to carry out a representative system of government.

The advantages of the present system are many.

In the first place, it has been stated that a Member of Congress has to wait 13 months after election before he can take his seat. That is not true, Mr. President. The Members of the present Congress did not wait 13 months. Whenever the President of the United States decides that it is time for an extra session, that the public exigency demands it, the Congress may be called in session four months after it is elected. The change now proposed in the Constitution would only reduce that four months to two months. On the other hand, whenever the President finds that there is no great exigency, no great necessity for an extra session, the Congress does not meet until 13 months after it is elected. What happens, Mr. President? What are the advantages of that long wait?

In the first place, as regards the President of the United States, he has just gone through a great election. Under our system, he is tired out with the job that he has undertaken of traveling up and down the country, of making an intensive campaign. He needs some time for rest and recuperation. Furthermore, he has to pick out his executives, his aides, his Cabinet; he has to interview hundreds of people who are interested in jobs for themselves or for their constituents or for their friends. I am sure that no President of the United States and no secretary to any President would tell us that the four months' period that now elapses between election day and the 4th of March is any too long for the President to adjust himself to the new conditions which confront him.

In the second place, under our present system the President selects his Cabinet; and the Cabinet officers have from the 4th of March until the first Monday in December to acquaint themselves with the business of government, to learn what is in their departments, and to make inspections. For instance, if Secretary of War, he has time to inspect Army posts and learn the needs of the Army; if Secretary of the Navy, to go on an inspection trip of the different fleets and navy yards, and thoroughly learn the business of his department; if Secretary of the Interior, to travel widely over those parts of the country which come more directly under him, public lands, and so forth, possibly the Territories, and learn his job. As a result, Mr. President, when the Congress finally meets in December, and we have appropriation bills presented to us, those appropriation bills come from an administration that has learned its job.

Of course, in the British system the government comes right into power. Why does that work in England? The reason is that the Premier in England, corresponding to the President here, and the members of the cabinet, are practically all trained in Parliament—people who have been in direct touch with the Government for years and years. They are not, as with us, persons like President Wilson, who had scarcely been in Washington for years, or like many members of many Cabinets, who are brought in from private life and have never had anything to do with the executive departments or the legislative department.

Our present system gives the President and his Cabinet adequate time to learn their job; and when they come before the committees of Congress, instead of having to rely upon the wisdom of a bureau chief, upon the direction of assistants in the departments who tell them what to do and how to do it and when to do it, they have a chance to make up their own minds; and that is one reason why we have benefited from this system. Whenever an exigency occurs, it is perfectly possible to bring the new Congress into existence within four months after the election; but, under normal conditions, there is an opportunity for the President to get in shape for his job and to learn his job, for the Cabinet to learn their job and to prepare their budget more effectively, and, in the third place, for Members of Congress themselves who come to it new to learn their jobs and to come into Congress better qualified.

Actually, Mr. President, even when an extra session has not been called, the Members of Congress take their places in their offices on the 4th of March, and are there during the next nine months, able to attend to the business with the departments that their constituents desire to have them take up. They learn about the Federal Government before it is their duty actually to pass upon laws. It has been the history of many extra sessions that the legislative business has not gone so well as it has in a regular session.

May I ask how much more time I have?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Three minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Finally, Mr. President, there is the question of the choice of President—perhaps one of the most important of all questions. In order that I may get that argument into the three minutes at my disposal I should like to read the words of the great Bourke Cockran, spoken in the House of Representatives on January 10, 1893, when a similar amendment was proposed, in which he said:

> The superiority of the Constitution as it stands as against the Constitution as it would be under the operation of this amendment is that the Congress which under the existing Constitution must pass upon all questions relating to a presidential succession has been chosen two years before the question can arise. It has organized by the election of a Speaker. Nobody can dispute its authority. No question of unfairness in its organization can be raised two years after the election of the Congress. It has already received the sanction of the loyalty of the people of the entire country. Its statutes have been recognized. That is the body which ought properly to pass upon all questions arising out of the presidential election. My friend from Texas would substitute for that well-settled and undisputed authority a body chosen in the very contest out of which has arisen the dispute with regard to the presidential succession.
> Mr. CHAIN. A Congress chosen by the people.
> Mr. COCKRAN. Chosen by the people, but chosen in the very contest out of which the presidential dispute arises. The circumstances attending the presidential election would be the circumstances attending the election of Members of Congress. The questions upon which the validity of the election of presidential electors would be disputed would furnish grounds for disputing the election of Members of the House of Representatives. And when the debate came before the people of the country they would find themselves confronted not alone with the question of a disputed presidential succession but, moreover, with the question of a disputed congressional succession. That dispute would be injected into the emergency by a force which no power could withstand, because of the great question which the Congress would be called upon to decide.

And later in the same debate he cogently said:

> By this proposition you substitute the unsettled for the settled; you substitute for the body which has received the unquestioned loyalty and assent of all the people of the country a body whose very existence and complexion would be the subject of dispute. Instead of having a well-ordered, well-regulated method, which has settled more than one question of presidential succession; which has given to this country from the day of its foundation a long line of rulers whose authority was never questioned by any department of the Government, you are going to open wide a breach in the constitutional system through which disputes of every character may enter—disputes which may cast a doubt for years upon the title of a President, and which may even array the people of the country into hostile camps warring against each other to settle by arms a question which there will be no tribunal to settle by peaceful methods.
>
> The important question here, the one that underlies the entire debate, is the propriety of submitting disputed presidential succession to a Congress that has received the assent and support of the whole people for a period long anterior to a presidential election or to a Congress chosen at the very election whose validity may be questioned.
>
> Now I desire to say to gentlemen on the other side of this question that in the history of the decay of republican institutions, we find many instances of disputed elections, of struggles that involve the perpetuity of representative government, arising from just such provisions as this amendment seeks to incorporate into the Constitution. The whole tendency of the fabric of government devised by our fathers has been a system of divided responsibilities, of divided powers, of divided opportunities for the exercise of popular power.
> The scheme has resolutely set its face against staking the stability of any more than a portion of the Government upon any one election. Look over the history of republican forms of government that have perished in the struggles that have arisen through disputed elections, and in every one of them you will find that the cardinal error that brought about disaster was the insertion in the constitutional scheme of provisions for elections involving the entire structure of government in one exercise of popular sovereignty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] starts out by the assertion that Congress has the power to shorten the terms of President, Senators, and Members of the House of Representatives by an act of Congress; and without quoting, except in one instance, the Constitution itself, he satisfies himself with that statement.

Let me read what the Constitution says about the term of the President of the United States.

Article II, section 1, of the Constitution reads as follows:

> The exective power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows:

Now, let us see what it says about Senators.

Amendment XVII to the Constitution of the United States, providing for the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people, in part reads as follows:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator will notice, right there, that it does not say "for a term of six years."

Mr. NORRIS. Of course it says "six years"; but even if the Senator were right, what is he going to say about the provision that I read in regard to the President, where it does say that he shall hold his office for a "term of four years"? And in order to inaugurate the President in January, and have the terms of Senators and Members of the House begin in January, we must, therefore, shorten their terms of office by a couple of months. It will therefore require a constitutional amendment. It seems to me that an eighth-grade student could understand that. It is too plain for anybody to be mistaken about it.

It was argued at length also, and is in the records of the Senate, and if he will look at the first report of the Judiciary Committee on this subject, or the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, where it was first referred—I have forgotten which one it is—the Senator will find an extended argument on the question. There can be no longer any doubt in anybody's mind about it.

Of course, we can, by statute, change the time of the meeting of Congress, but we can not fix that time prior to the 4th of March without the result that the old Congress, many Members of which may have been defeated and will be holding over after election, will be the Congress that will enact the laws. So that if by legislative act we changed the time of meeting to the 4th of March, or any time previous to that, we would not be able to have the new Congress in operation, because under existing conditions the terms of office of the Members begin on the 4th day of March.

I want to refer to what the Senator said about "lame ducks." I realize that that term is often abused. I am not casting any insinuation, and this amendment does not cast any insinuation. against any man who has been defeated for reelection. But nobody has ever applied the term "lame duck," so far as I am aware, to anyone who was not defeated, and none of those whose names the Senator has read would be "lame ducks" under that kind of an interpretation.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. In order to correct the record, I am sure the Senator, who was, I think, here at the time, will remember that Uncle Joe Cannon was defeated and was a "lame duck" in that sense, and his was one of the names I read.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; he was at one time; he was defeated. The Senator referred to Senator GILLETT, a Member of this body, He was not defeated. The Senator referred to other men who came from the House of Representatives. That applies to me, I may say; I was one of those. Nobody ever thought of such a thing as applying the term to that class.

It does not follow that because a man is defeated he has been dishonored or that any aspersion is cast upon his character or his ability or his patriotism. But since I have been a Member of this body disgraceful things have occurred. In a short session, after Members have been defeated for reelection, we have seen them subserviently coming to the patronage trough and imbibing of the patronage which the President of the United States was giving to them. We know of many instances where during the entire session they were as subservient to the wish of the President of the United States as a slave is to his master. We have seen the Congress adjourn, and we have seen those who have followed their masters get the fat jobs when the people at home had taken their positions as Representatives or Senators away from them. They were legislating after they had been defeated. Good or bad, wise or foolish, no man ought to be permitted to continue to legislate for 120,000,000 people after he has been defeated at the polls. He may even be right in the long run; that makes no difference; but under present conditions we have an election in November and we have a meeting of Congress in December. It is the old Congress, not the new Congress, and they legislate.

The Senator referred to the election of a President by the House of Representatives. Again there is an argument which no man can refute why this amendment should be agreed to. Suppose the election of the President is thrown into the House of Representatives and the election of the Vice President is thrown into the Senate. What House and what Senate is it that elect? It is the old ones. In the House it might be possible for every single one of the Members to have been defeated at the same presidential election taking place in November, and yet they would be the ones who would elect a President to serve over the United States for four years.

Mr. President, there is not a civilized nation on earth, not one, that has such an antiquated method of providing for its legislative body. There is not a State in the Union, Connecticut not excepted, that has such an outworn method. In the State of Connecticut they elect the legislature in November and the members go into office in January. They elect a governor in November and he goes into office in January. The old legislature never has another session after the election. If this amendment shall be agreed to and shall become a part of the Constitution, that is the system that will be applied to the Federal Government.

Mr. President, in the few minutes which I want to take, I desire to speak of another thing which was mentioned in the debate yesterday, I think, in regard to the filibuster. It has been said, and it was said to-day, I think, by the Senator from Connecticut, that a filibuster is often a good thing. It is sometimes a good thing because there are serving in the Senate and sometimes in the House Members who have been defeated for reelection, and who are carrying out the will and command and the wish of somebody else; it may be the President; it may be a political boss somewhere. That has often occurred; we have seen it time and again. At some sessions there is none of it, and sometimes there is a great deal of it.

A filibuster comes at the end of the short session, when Congress must adjourn at noon on the 4th day of March, when everybody knows that everything unfinished at that time will be dead in a legislative sense. Hence a few men, if they undertake it a sufficient length of time before the 4th of March, can cripple the legislative business of the country. We have seen it happen in almost every short session, where we are in session two or three nights, and if it is Sunday, all day on Sunday, until noon of the 4th of March, with a few men filibustering.

I have taken part in some of those filibusters. A filibuster has come about often because the President of the United States, with the assistance of men who have been defeated for reelection, was trying to put something through Congress. In the instance I am about to cite I am not referring to the arguments for the legislation involved either pro or con, because it was a two-sided question, but in a short session which occurred while President Harding was President of the United States there was a noted illustration of what takes place by the use of the so-called "lame ducks" carrying out the President's policy. There was a certain bill which did not pass the House of Representatives in the long session, and everybody knew it could not have passed, but in the short session it passed. Everybody knew it could not have passed the Senate before election, but they had the votes here to pass it during the short session. Many men honestly and conscientiously were for the bill, it is true; the votes were somewhat evenly divided, but with the addition of those who had been defeated for reelection, its passage was made certain. A filibuster was engaged in in order to prevent its passage, and we defeated the bill by that filibuster. In the Congress which followed, when the new men had come into office, that bill was not even suggested by the President, and it was never heard of during that Congress.

Mr. President, when that session of Congress was over, we saw those men getting jobs better than those the people had taken away from them, one here and one there, some here and some there. The natural conclusion was drawn—the country has drawn it—that it was in recompense for the faithfulness with which they tried to help carry out a program which would never have been attempted if it had not been in a short session of Congress, with enough defeated Members there holding the balance of power.

It does not mean that every defeated Member is susceptible of that kind of influence. I am not charging that, and I am not giving any names, but Senators who have been here for a long time know that such things often happen, and the country knows it. The contrary is likewise often true. Men who have been defeated stand as firmly for the things they believe in after election as they did before, and it is no discredit to them to have been defeated.

Mr. President, this amendment only puts the United States on a basis, as far as its Federal Congress is concerned, with the best thought of the civilized age in which we live. There has never been a single argument produced against this amendment which, to my way of thinking, has any weight whatever. Why is it that there is any opposition to it? I am not charging any wrong motive, or anything of that kind, but I will state who gets the benefit of the present condition. It is the political machine, the political bosses. Whenever we get into a jam in the short session of Congress, who has the advantage? It is the machine that is in control. They can see to it that this comes up and that is held back, and the result is that those who are controlling political machines are the ones in that kind of a contest who always have the advantage. As far as I know, that is the only argument against this amendment.

Mr. President, there are still a few minutes left, but perhaps some other Senators want to say just a word, and I will yield the floor, although I have not finished. I ask unanimous consent to insert, at the conclusion of my remarks, the report of the committee on the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report, submitted by Mr. NORRIS from the Committee on the Judiciary, April 22, 1929, is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 3) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, report the same to the Senate with the recommendation that the same be amended as follows:

On page 2, line 3, strike out the word "2d" and insert in lieu thereof the word "15th." Line 5, strike out the word "15th" and insert in lieu thereof the word "2d." Line 18, strike out the words

"where the Vice President has not been chosen" and insert in lieu thereof the words "of the failure to choose the Vice President." Line 20, after the word "shall," where it first appears in said line, insert the word "then."

As thus amended, the resolution is in exactly the same form as it passed the Senate in the Seventieth Congress and practically the same form as the Senate has passed this resolution in four preceding Congresses. There is practically unanimous sentiment of the country in favor of this amendment. No logical objection has ever been made to the constitutional changes suggested and its passage again by the Senate will only be a response to a patriotic sentiment country wide for the proposed constitutional change. We append extracts from the report made in the Seventieth Congress, which explain in detail just what would be accomplished by the adoption of the proposed amendment.

It passed the Senate the first time on February 13, 1923. On the 22d day of February, 1923, it received a favorable report from the House committee and was placed on the House Calendar. No action was taken by the House, and it died on the 4th day of March, 1923, because of the adjournment of Congress. It passed the Senate the second time on the 14th day of March, 1924, and on the 15th day of April, 1924, it was favorably reported by the House committee. It remained on the calendar of the House, without any action being taken thereon, from the 15th of April, 1924, until the expiration of the Sixty-eighth Congress on the 4th day of March, 1925. It again passed the Senate, in the Sixty-ninth Congress, on February 15, 1926. It was again favorably reported by the House committee, on the 24th day of February, 1926, and remained on the House Calendar, without any action thereon, from said date until the expiration of the Sixty-ninth Congress on the 4th day of March, 1927. In the Seventieth Congress the resolution passed the Senate on January 4, 1928, was referred to the House Judiciary Committee, from which it received a favorable report, and on March 9, 1928, the House acted, and, while it received a large majority of those voting, it failed to receive the two-thirds majority required by the Constitution.

The resolution proposes to amend the Constitution of the United States by fixing the beginning of the terms of President and Vice President at noon on the 15th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 2d day of January following their election in the preceding November. Under existing conditions a new Congress does not actually convene in regular session until a year and one month after its Members have been elected. When our Constitution was adopted there was some reason for such a long intervention of time between the election and the actual commencement of work by the new Congress. We had neither railroads nor telegraphic communication connecting the various States and communities of the country. Under present conditions, however, the result of elections is known all over the country within a few hours after the polls close, and the Capital City is within a few days' travel of the remotest portions of the country.

Originally, Senators were elected by the legislatures, and as a rule the legislatures of the various States did not convene until after the beginning of the new year, and it was difficult and sometimes impossible for Senators to be elected until February or March. Since the adoption of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, however, Senators have been elected by the people at the same election at which Members of the House are elected. There is no reason, therefore, why the Congress elected in November should not be sworn in and actually enter upon the duties of office at least as soon as the beginning of the new year following their election.

The only direct opportunity that the citizens of the country have to express their ideas and their wishes in regard to national legislation is the expression of their will through the election of their representatives at the general election in November. During the campaign that precedes this election the great questions demanding attention at the hands of the new Congress are discussed at length before the people and throughout the country, and it is only fair to presume that the Members of Congress chosen at that election fairly represent the ideas of a majority of the people of the country as to what legislation is desirable. In a Government "by the people" the wishes of a majority should be crystallized into legislation as soon as possible after these wishes have been made known. These mandates should be obeyed within a reasonable time.

Under existing conditions, however, more than a year elapses before the will of the people expressed at the election can be put into statutory law. This condition of affairs is not only unfair to the citizenship at large, who have expressed their will as to what legislation they desire, but it is likewise unfair to their servants whom they have elected to carry out this will. It is true that it is within the power of the President to call an extraordinary session of Congress at an earlier date than the one provided by law, but the new Congress can not be called into extraordinary session until after the 4th of March, which would not give the new Congress very much time for the consideration of important national questions before the summer heat in the Capital City makes even existence difficult and good work almost impossible. It is conceded by all that the best time for legislatures to do good work is during the winter months. Practically all the States of the Union recognize this fact and provide for the meeting of their legislatures near the 1st of January. Moreover, the wishes of the country having been expressed at an election should not be dependent for their carrying out upon the will of the President alone. Provision should be made by law so that the new Congress could begin the performance of its important duties as soon after election as possible and under conditions that are most favorable for good work. Under existing conditions a Member of the House of Representatives does not get started in his work until the time has arrived for renominations in his district. He has accomplished nothing and has not had an opportunity to accomplish anything, because Congress has not been in session. He had made no record upon which to go before his people for election. It is unfair both to him and to the people of his district. In case of a contest over a seat in the House of Representatives, history has shown that the term of office has practically expired before the House is able to settle the question as to who is entitled to the contested seat. During all this time the occupant of the seat has been drawing the salary, and if it is decided in the end that the occupant was wrongfully seated, then the entire salary must again be paid to the person who has been unjustly deprived of his seat. Double pay is therefore drawn from the Treasury of the United States and the people of the district have not been represented by the Member whom they selected for that purpose. No reason has been given why a new Congress elected at a general election to translate into law the wishes of the people should not be installed into office practically as soon as the results of the election can be determined.

Another effect of the amendment would be to abolish the so-called short session of Congress. If the terms of Members of Congress begin and end in January instead of on the 4th of March, as heretofore, and Congress convenes in January, there would be no such thing as a short session of Congress. Every other year, under our Constitution, the terms of Members of the House and one-third of the Members of the Senate expire on the 4th day of March. The session begins on the first Monday in December, and because of the expiration of such terms it necessarily follows that the session must end not later than the 4th of March. Experience has shown that this brings about a very undesirable legislative condition. It is a physical impossibility during such a short session for Congress to give attention to much general legislation for the reason that it requires practically all of the time to dispose of the regular appropriation bills. The result is a congested calendar both in the House and the Senate. It is known in advance that Congress can give attention to but a very small portion of the bills reported from the committees. The result is a congested condition that brings about either no legislation or illy considered legislation. In the closing days of such a session bad laws get through and good laws are defeated on account of this condition and the want of time to give proper consideration to anything, and the result is dissatisfaction not only on the part of Members of Congress but on the part of the people generally. Jokers sometimes get on the statutes because Members do not have an opportunity, for want of time, to give them proper consideration. Mistakes of a serious nature creep into all kinds of statutes which often nullify the real intent of the lawmakers, and the result is disappointment throughout the country. Such a congested condition in the National Legislature can not bring about good results. However diligent and industrious Members of Congress may be, it is a physical impossibility for them to do good work. Moreover, it enables a few Members of Congress to arbitrarily prevent the passage of laws simply by the consumption of time. In every way it brings about an undesirable legislative condition, and it is not surprising that results are so often disappointing.

There is another very important reason why this change should be made. Under the Constitution as it now stands, if it should happen that in the general election in November in presidential years no candidate for President had received a majority of all the electoral votes, the election of a President would then be thrown into the House of Representatives and the membership of that House of Representatives called upon to elect a President would be the old Congress and not the new one just elected by the people. It might easily happen that the Members of the House of Representatives, upon whom involved the solemn duty of electing a Chief Magistrate for four years, had themselves been repudiated at the election that had just occurred, and the country would be confronted with the fact that a repudiated House, defeated by the people themselves at the general election, would still have the power to elect a President who would be in control of the country for the next four years. It is quite apparent that such a power ought not to exist and that the people, having expressed themselves at the ballot box, should, through the Representatives then selected, be able to select the President for the ensuing term. If the amendment we have proposed is adopted and becomes a part of the Constitution, such a condition could not happen, and in such a case the new House of Representatives, fresh from the people, would be the one upon which would devolve the power to select the new President.

Section 3 of the proposed amendment gives Congress the power to provide by law who shall act as President in a case where the election of a President has been thrown into the House of Representatives and the House has failed to elect a President and the Senate has likewise failed to elect a Vice President. The importance of this can be understood when we realize that under the present Constitution if the election of President and Vice President should be thrown into Congress on account of a failure of the Electoral College to elect, and that the House should fail within the time specified in the Constitution to elect a President, and the Senate should likewise fail during such time to elect a Vice President, the country would be left entirely without a Chief Magistrate and without any means of selecting one. This condition has, it is true, never happened in the history of the country, and while it may never happen it does seem very important that some constitutional provision be enacted by which this most dangerous emergency may be avoided. The present Constitution gives power to Congress to provide who shall act as President when there is a vacancy both in the President's office and the Vice President's office caused by death, removal, or resignation, but there is no provision in the present Constitution that gives to Congress or any other authority the power to select an acting President in cases where the election has been thrown into the House of Representatives and where the House of Representatives has failed to elect a President, and the Senate has likewise failed to elect a Vice President. If such a contingency should occur, and it is liable to occur after any presidential election, the country would find itself in a condition where it would be impossible for a Chief Magistrate to be selected. The committee has corrected this defect by giving to Congress in section 3 of the proposed amendment the authority to select the acting President in such an emergency.

The question is sometimes asked, Why is an amendment to the Constitution necessary to bring about this desirable change? The Constitution does not provide the date when the terms of Senators and Representatives shall begin. It does fix the term of Senators at six years and of Members of the House of Representatives at two years. The commencement of the term of the first President and Vice President and of Senators and Representatives composing the First Congress was fixed by an act of Congress adopted September 13, 1788, and that act provided "that the first Wednesday in March next be the time for commencing proceedings under the Constitution." It happened that the first Wednesday in March was the 4th day of March, and hence the terms of the President and Vice President and Members of Congress begin on the 4th day of March. Since the Constitution provides that the terms of Senators shall be six years and the term of Members of the House of Representatives two years, it follows that this change can not be made without changing the terms of office of Senators and Representatives, which would in effect be a change of the Constitution. By another act—the act of March 1, 1792—Congress provided that the terms of President and Vice President should commence on the 4th day of March after their election. It seems clear, therefore, that an amendment to the Constitution is necessary to give relief from existing conditions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be offered, the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. NORRIS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEFLIN (when Mr. BLACK's name was called). My colleague [Mr. BLACK] is absent on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. BLAINE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. BLAINE] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BURTON (when Mr. FESS's name was called). My colleague [Mr. FESS] is absent on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. ASHURST (when Mr. HAYDEN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. HAYDEN] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when the name of Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana was called). My colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] is absent on an important engagement. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SCHALL (when Mr. SHIPSTEAD's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SIMMONS's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when Mr. STEPHENS's name was called). My colleague [Mr. STEPHENS] is unavoidably detained on account of illness in his family. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON],

Mr. WHEELER (when the name of Mr. WALSH of Montana was called). My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming, and not knowing how he would vote I withdraw my vote.

Mr. McMASTER. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BURTON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who, if he were present, would vote "yea." Therefore I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JONES. The senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is necessarily absent on account of illness. If present, he would vote "yea." Also the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD] is absent on account of illness in his family. If he were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is necessarily absent on official business. If present, he would vote "yea."

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] is necessarily absent from the city.

The result was announced—yeas 64, nays 9, as follows:

So the joint resolution was passed, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

The joint resolution as passed by the Senate is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment of the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 15th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 2d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 2d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

"SEC. 3. If the House of Representatives has not chosen a President, whenever the right of choice devolves upon them, before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The Congress shall by law provide for the case of the failure to choose the Vice President before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly until the House of Representatives chooses a President or until the Senate chooses a Vice President.

"SEC. 4. This amendment shall take effect on the 15th day of October after its ratification."

Mr. GLASS subsequently said: Mr. President, I merely want to state that due to the fact that the bells are out of order, that I had to respond to a telephone call a moment ago during the recording of the vote which was taken on the joint resolution of the Senator from Nebraska, and that I encountered an elevator man more intent upon accommodating the crowd than accommodating and responding to the signal of a Senator, I reached the Chamber after the vote was announced. Therefore I take this occasion to have the RECORD show that had I been present I would have voted for the joint resolution of the Senator from Nebraska.

DECENNIAL CENSUS AND APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 312) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress, which were, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "radio sets"; on page 1, line 5, to strike out "1929" and insert "1930"; on page 2, to strike out line 6 and down to and including the word "act" in line 7 and insert "1st day of January in the year 1930 and every tenth year thereafter"; on page 2, line 12, to strike out "12 months" and insert "six months from the beginning of the enumeration"; on page 3, line 5, to strike out all after the word "him" down to and including the word "service" in line 7; on page 3, line 12, to strike out all after the word "transfer" down to and including the word "positions" in line 20; on page 3, line 22, to strike out all after the word "rules" down to and including the word "women" in line 25; on page 4, line 7, to strike out all after the word "made" down to and including the word "engaged" in line 12 and insert "without reference to the civil service or the classification acts, but preference shall be given to disabled veterans of wars in which the United States has been engaged and wives of disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines who themselves are not qualified, but whose wives are qualified for appointment"; on page 4, to strike out all after the word "census," in line 21, down to and including the word "them" in line 24 and insert "and, when so employed, shall not be subject to the provisions of section 1765 of the Revised Statutes or to the act of May 10, 1916, and August 29, 1916 (39 Stat. p. 120, sec. 6, and p. 582, sec. 6; title 5, secs. 58 and 59, U. S. C.)"; on page 5, line 19, to strike out all after the word "distribution" down to and including the word "sets" in line 20; on page 7, line 3, to strike out the word "November" and insert "May"; on page 10, line 20, after "$1,000," insert "or be imprisoned for not exceeding one year, or both"; on page 14, line 3, to strike out "1934" and insert "1935"; on page 14, line 10, to strike out "November" and insert "January"; on page 15, line 9, to strike out "satistical" and insert "statistical"; on page 16, to strike out lines 21 to 25, inclusive, and all of page 17 and lines 1 to 9, inclusive, on page 18 and insert:

SEC. 22. (a) On the first day, or within one week thereafter, of the second regular session of the Seventy-first Congress, and of each fifth Congress thereafter, the President shall transmit to the Congress a statement showing the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed, as ascertained under the fifteenth and each subsequent decennial census of the population, and the number of Representatives to which each State would be entitled under an apportionment of the then existing number of Representatives made in each of the following manners:

(1) By apportioning the then existing number of Representatives among the several States according to the respective numbers of the several States as ascertained under such census, by the method used in the last preceding apportionment, no State to receive less than one Member;

(2) By apportioning the then existing number of Representatives among the several States according to the respective numbers of the several States as ascertained under such census, by the method known as the method of major fractions, no State to receive less than one Member; and

(3) By apportioning the then existing number of Representatives among the several States according to the respective numbers of the several States as ascertained under such census, by the method known as the method of equal proportions, no State to receive less than one Member.

(b) If the Congress to which the statement required by subdivision (a) of this section is transmitted, fails to enact a law apportioning Representatives among the several States, then each State shall be entitled, in the second succeeding Congress and in each Congress thereafter until the taking effect of a reapportionment under this act or subsequent statute, to the number of Representatives shown in the statement based upon the method used in the last preceding apportionment. It shall be the duty of the Clerk of the last House of Representatives forthwith to send to the executive of each State a certificate of the number of Representatives to which such State is entitled under this section. In case of a vacancy in the office of Clerk, or of his absence or inability to discharge this duty, then such duty shall devolve upon the officer, who, under section 32 or 33 of the Revised Statutes, is charged with the preparation of the roll of Representatives elect.

(c) This section shall have no force and effect in respect of the apportionment to be made under any decennial census unless the statement required by subdivision (a) of this section in respect of such census is transmitted to the Congress within the time prescribed in subdivision (a).

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. JONES, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. VANDENBERG, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. SHEPPARD conferees on the part of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. JONES, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. 312) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress, be printed showing the amendments of the House of Representatives numbered.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. BRATTON, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1329) granting a pension to Joseph H. Greer, and it was referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT TO TARIFF BILL—MANGANESE ORE OR CONCENTRATES

Mr. ODDIE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 2667, the tariff revision bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

PROPOSED STATUES ON ARLINGTON MEMORIAL BRIDGE

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 85) as follows:

Resolved, That the Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to take into consideration in the completion of the Memorial Bridge the placing at the north end of the bridge a heroic figure of Ulysses S. Grant, facing south, and at the south end of the bridge a heroic figure of Robert E. Lee, facing north, and in the center two figures of women, clasping hands representing the North and South, to perpetuate the memorable saying of General Grant, "Let us clasp hands across the bloody chasm"; and any such other figures as the commission may recommend; and to report its findings and recommendations on the practicability of erecting said statues on the bridge, together with the costs of the erection of such figures and the appropriation which will be necessary; and such other recommendations as in its judgment may be proper in carrying into effect this patriotic sentiment; all of which shall be reported to Congress at the next session.

"As we are united in life, and they united in death, let one monument perpetuate their deeds, and one people, forgetful of all asperities, forever hold in grateful remembrance all the stories of that terrible conflict."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this is not a joint resolution?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; it is a Senate resolution.

Mr. JONES. I do not believe the Senate itself can direct what the resolution directs. I think it ought to go to a committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is merely a suggestion to the Memorial Bridge Commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is a direction to the commission to take into consideration the placing of certain statues on the bridge?

Mr. JONES. I am inclined to think the resolution should go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over.

ADMIRAL THOMAS P. MAGRUDER

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the other day I interrogated the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. HALE] with reference to Admiral Magruder and the reasons for his being relieved of duty and the reasons for the department failing to reassign him to duty. I offer a resolution at this time dealing with the question, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be received and so referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 86) was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

Whereas there appeared in the Saturday Evening Post of September 24, 1927, an article entitled "The Navy and Economy," by Rear Admiral T. P. Magruder, which discussed the administration of the Department of the Navy; and

Whereas, on October 3, 1927, the Secretary of the Navy addressed a communication to Admiral Magruder, who was then commandant of the fourth naval district, with headquarters at Philadelphia, requesting him to submit to the department further information relative to certain statements contained in said article; and

Whereas, after an interchange of correspondence between the then Secretary of the Navy and Admiral Magruder, the former issued an order dated October 29, 1927, relieving Admiral Magruder from his command of the fourth naval district, effective November 5, 1927; and

Whereas there appeared in the Washington Evening Star of October 27, 1927, an article relative to Admiral Magruder being relieved of his command, which quoted the Secretary of the Navy as saying, "The order to Admiral Magruder in not punitive; it is administrative"; and

Whereas Admiral Magruder has not, since being relieved of his command of the fourth naval district, been reassigned to active duty by the Department of the Navy, and it is currently reported that such nonassignment is the result of the publication of the article referred to; and

Whereas Admiral Magruder is at present on the active list of officers of the Department of the Navy, drawing the full pay and allowances of a rear admiral in the United States Navy, and is by reason of his ability and experience qualified for further service as a naval officer: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to make an investigation as to the cause of Admiral Magruder being relieved of his command of the fourth naval district, and the reason why he has not been assigned to any duty whatever since being relieved of such command; and whether it is the purpose of the Secretary of the Navy to not further assign Admiral Magruder to any command, position, or service in the Navy, and whether the relieving of Admiral Magruder from his command and not assigning him to any duty since the date he was relieved was for the purpose of punishing him; and if so, what acts or omissions on the part of Admiral Magruder justified said action by the Secretary of the Navy, and to report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the result of its investigation, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation dealing with the matter herein referred to, and questions relating to cognate matters.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-first Congress, to employ such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require, by subpœna or otherwise, the attendance of such witnesses, and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words.

The expenses of the committee or subcommittee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

CERTAIN PRINCIPLES OF THOMAS JEFFERSON—ADDRESS OF HON. JOSEPH B. SHANNON

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD an address by Hon. Joseph B. Shannon, of Kansas City, Mo., on the subject of Certain Principles of Thomas Jefferson.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

My subject to-night is Thomas Jefferson. A mere general speech concerning the life of this great man would have to be a most perfunctory performance, the subject being too great to cover in one speech. Hence, I have selected a few things in his life that I want to talk to you about with a view to giving at least to a part of his life and doctrines a present-day application.

Let me call your attention first to Jefferson's views on the slavery question—a phase of his liberal and comprehensive democracy almost wholly misunderstood or entirely forgotten.

Jefferson was an abolitionist; he couldn't have been otherwise and been the great humanitarian that he was. He could not have been the great apostle of freedom and equality and remained blind to human slavery, existing as it did in the Colonies. Let us turn to his record upon this great issue, which it took a civil war to settle a half century later.

First. Jefferson was elected to the Virginia House of Burgesses when he was about 25 years of age. He undertook, by enactment, to repeal the expulsion law then in effect in the Colonies. The expulsion act required that a slave that had earned his freedom through the kindness of his master should instantly leave the Colony, the theory being that the presence of free negroes would promote discontent amongst the slaves. This idea was repulsive to Jefferson. He believed that where one had earned his freedom he should be permitted to remain where he was born and had lived his life. This was the human side of the question, not the property side. Of course, his measure was defeated.

Second. When Jefferson prepared the Declaration of Independence, in addition to writing that all men are created equal he also wrote in the original draft of this nationally sacred document a terrific indictment of the English King and the British Government in the following language: "He, the King, has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating its most sacred rights of life and liberty in the persons of a distant people, who never offended him, capturing and carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare is the warfare of the Christian King of Great Britain, determined to keep open a market where men could be bought and sold." Jefferson's colleagues in the Continental Congress suppressed this particular indictment of the King and Great Britain for the reason that New England had hundreds of ships engaged in the slave trade, and the South was making use of slave labor. In the making of the Declaration of Independence there were 18 such suppressions, 6 additions, and 10 alterations from the original draft of Jefferson.

JEFFERSON FORESHADOWED LINCOLN

Third. Jefferson proposed a gradual emancipation of the slaves; that the children born after a certain date were to be free, but to remain with the parents, the duty of the State to be to educate these children in all lines, especially in the trades, farming and such pursuits, and then, after the period had been reached when they were able to take care of themselves, the State was to furnish a habitation somewhere in a country in which they could live and be free.

Fourth. Jefferson succeeded in having Congress pass a bill prohibiting the further importation of slaves after the year 1808.

Fifth. When Jefferson was appointed chairman of a committee to organize the Territories out of which the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Kentucky were subsequently carved, he proposed a plan which would have given to the slaves their freedom. This plan of his lost by a single vote. The vote was taken by States, 7 votes being required to decide the proposition affirmatively. It only received 6. Jefferson said: "Thus we see the fate of millions unborn, hanging on the tongue of one man, and heaven was silent in that awful moment." Writing a friend he said: "We must await with patience the workings of an overruling Providence and hope that it is preparing the deliverance of these our suffering brethren. When the measure of their tears shall be full, when their groans shall have involved Heaven itself in darkness, doubtless a God of Justice will awaken to their distress." When Jefferson died he had on his plantation 143 slaves, more than 50 of them were over 90 years of age, and less than 15 were under 45. The truth of it is, his plantation was a home for aged negroes.

Sixth. In his Notes on Virginia, Jefferson said concerning slavery: "Indeed, I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just, and that His justice can not sleep forever. The abolition of slavery," he said, "is not impossible, and ought never to be despaired of. Every plan should be advocated and every experiment tried which may do something toward the ultimate object." He also said: "Remember, it is written in the book of fate that these people [referring to the Negro race] shall be free."

Thus we have chronologically set out the record on slavery of the founder of the Democratic Party, a position taken by him when it was the unpopular side; much of it long before Abraham Lincoln was born, and all of it before Lincoln had obtained any prominence in public affairs.

THE NATION'S BIRTHDAY PARAMOUNT

Next I shall discuss Jefferson on national birthdays. Nothing could more aptly illustrate the departure from the teachings of Jefferson than the holding of Jefferson birthday meetings. While Jefferson was President he refused even to let it be known upon what day he was born. When citizens of Boston proposed to make his birthday a holiday he wrote them that he did not approve of transferring the honor and veneration due the great birthday of our Republic to any individual, or of dividing its commemoration with that of mere individuals. Jefferson, of course, in this like in everything, was much wiser than his time, and he foresaw the danger that would come from a forgetting of America's great natal day—the Fourth of July. Unlike Jefferson, John Adams did not have the vision of a day when this great holiday of liberty might be forgotten, for in his speech urging the adoption of the Declaration of Independence, eloquent and masterful as it was, he drew a picture of its future which showed that he was more of an orator than a prophet. He said:

"Through the thick gloom of the present I see the brightness of the future as the sun in heaven. We shall make this a glorious, an immortal day. When we are in our graves our children will honor it. They will celebrate it with thanksgiving, with festivity, with bonfires, and illuminations. On its annual return they will shed tears, copious, gushing tears, not of subjection and slavery, not of agony and distress, but of exultation, of gratitude, and of joy."

How many here to-night saw a bonfire on the last Fourth of July? How many were present when any tears were shed? How many of you have ever even heard the reading of the Declaration of Independence? Jefferson was alive to the danger of trusting to fleeting and forgetful generations to keep alive America's great birthday and what it stood for, especially when burdened by numerous other national holidays.

OPPOSED GIFTS TO OFFICIALS

Next let me refer to a trait of this great statesman that may seem, perhaps, trivial to you, but which will illustrate his zealous regard of the least act that would seem to suggest approval of prejudice or privilege. I refer to Jefferson's views on gifts. When the late Woodrow Wilson was in Europe the press informed us that he was the recipient of many gifts. President Hoover toured South America shortly after his election. Upon his return many were startled by the information that it took three freight cars to transport his gifts.

The press of Missouri for several days has been full of information concerning gifts made to a Cabinet officer from Missouri. The gifts were almost as numerous, according to the printed inventory, as the number, which was nine, that composed the committee presenting the gifts to this eminent Cabinet officer. Two days later there was a little but significant aftermath to the gifts to the Secretary—an announcement in the press that the chairman of the giving committee "may decide to become an applicant for a district attorneyship."

There is in a prison cell in Los Angeles at this moment a former district attorney who, it turned out, shortly after he took office began receiving gifts. His first gift was some personal wearing apparel. It was the opening wedge—the "feeler." His next gift was a Victrola, then an automobile, then a house and lot, and then it was shown that he took $50,000 in a criminal proceeding; and then, not least even if it was last of all, he was given and received 10 years in the penitentiary.

Thus is presented the gift practice of the present day as viewed from many angles. How out of variance to the teachings of Jefferson! How startlingly it bears out the wisdom of his far-seeing judgment! In 1806 a bronze bust of Emperor Alexander of Russia was presented to him, and he said: "I had laid down as a law for my conduct in office, and have heretofore scrupulously observed it, to accept no present beyond a book or a pamphlet, or other curiosity of minor value." He accepted the bust with the foregoing explanation and with perhaps good diplomatic reasons. Even to the last days of his Presidency he returned insignificant presents made to him by admiring friends. Three months before he went out of office Samuel Hawkins, an admirer, undertook to present him with an ivory cane. He wrote a courteous letter in returning the gift, mentioning again the rule that he had adopted for himself, and pleading his wish to retain that "consciousness of a disinterested administration of the public trust which is essential to perfect tranquillity of mind," a tranquillity of mind and conscience such as, I am afraid, is not the proud ambition of present-day holders of public trusts, as it was of Jefferson's entire official career.

It matters not who it is that accepts gifts while in public office, it is such a departure from the teachings of Jefferson that it can not but be inimical to the spirit of sincere democracy and the ends of good government. Jefferson not only adhered to this rule inflexibly while he was President, but after retiring from office he refused compensation of any kind for any employment that might carry with it the inference that his former holding of the great office of President was being capitalized.

How beautifully a similar feeling was carried out by the late Gen. Robert E. Lee, who, though impoverished almost to the point of destitution, declined a connection with an insurance company at a vast salary, lest it be said that he was bartering away the name of Lee. Contrast the action of Jefferson and Lee with that of many of the modern office-holders, who are hardly out of office until the name and fame that was attained in office is capitalized in a corporation employment.

AN ENEMY OF INTOLERANCE

Next let me touch upon a timely theme—Jefferson's views on religion. This subject can not be covered briefly. I will not attempt to go into it at any great length. Suffice for me to say that from the moment he engaged in the movement to separate the Colony of Virginia from the state church of England clear up to the time of the enactment of his statute of religious freedom of Virginia he never wavered or hesitated for a moment in his great fight for the separation of state and church and for freedom of religious worship. To-night I will confine myself to two quotations from him. In a letter to Miles King, September 26, 1804, he said: "Our particular principles of religion are a subject of accountability to our God alone. I inquire after no man's and trouble none with mine.

"Let us not be uneasy, then, about the different roads we may pursue as believing them the shortest to that of our last abode." In his original bill for the establishment of religious freedom he said: "Our civil rights have no dependence on our religious opinions any more than our opinions in physics or geometry, therefore the proscribing any citizen as unworthy of public confidence by laying upon him an incapacity of being called to office of trust and emolument unless he profess or renounce this or that religious opinion, is depriving him injuriously of those privileges and advantages to which, in common with his fellow citizens, he has a natural right; that it tends also to corrupt the principles of that very religion it is meant to encourage by bribing, with a monopoly of worldly honors and emoluments, those who will externally profess and conform to it; and that though, indeed, these are criminal who do not withstand such temptation, yet neither are those innocent who lay the bait in their way."

The Victorian period in British history followed many years after Jefferson said this. Queen Victoria had a Premier, Benjamin Disraeli, who was the grandson of a Jewish merchant, who had emigrated from Italy to England. This ancestor was very rich. His wife was beautiful.

Due to these two possessions, wealth and beauty, she believed she was entitled to a high social position. It was denied her because she was a Jewess. There was a son of this couple who, when he attained manhood, dropped out of trade and became a scholar. He in turn had a son and a daughter. He realized that certain things were denied his people by reason of their faith. While his children were of tender age he had them avow membership in the Church of England. The grandmother urged it for the reason that she did not want the ban that was placed upon her to be visited upon the grandchildren. How valuable politically this profession of membership in the Church of England proved itself was shown in the very Parliament in which Disraeli was admitted as a member wherein he had taken the oath as a Christian. One of the house of Rothschild was denied membership in the Parliament because he could not take the oath. Thus we see perfectly exemplified the evil that Jefferson in his foresight sought to guard against in the great Commonwealth of Virginia. This specious profession of religion upon the part of Disraeli, who by ancestry, by birth, and by training was of Jewish race and traditions, was successful not only in overcoming English prejudice but English laws as well.

Jefferson's greatest hobby was for the general dissemination of education among all classes. "He wanted an aristocracy founded on education rather than wealth and ancestry."

THE FOUNDER OF THE TRUSTS

In the early formation of this Government there sat in Washington's Cabinet alongside of Jefferson a statesman of a different stripe—Alexander Hamilton—who was "the father of plutocracy, the trust, and the lobby." "The people are a great beast," said Hamilton; and one of his modern disciples exclaimed, "The public be damned."

Jefferson left the Cabinet of Washington because of the differences between him and Hamilton. He believed that, notwithstanding his previous views that this Government should be without parties, it finally became necessary to have one to protect the masses from the so-called "well born" and the rich who were so well represented in the person of Hamilton, whose basic doctrine was that the people who owned the country should govern it. Jefferson believed that all the people who inhabited the country should have a share in its Government. Hamilton for a time even poisoned the mind of Washington against Jefferson by spreading reports that Jefferson had not been a supporter of the Constitution. Jefferson, in a letter to Washington, said: "I acknowledge and avow that in private conversation I have disapproved of the system of the Secretary of the Treasury. His system flowed from principles adverse to liberty. Colonel Hamilton and I have not drawn together. I had some misgivings concerning the Constitution, for the reason it contained no Bill of Rights securing freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom from a standing army, and a constant habeas corpus act. Colonel Hamilton, likewise, was unfriendly to the Constitution because he wanted a king and a house of lords." Jefferson also, in other writings, said he was fearful of the Constitution because it provided no fixed tenure of office and no proper regulation of monopoly. Without Jefferson there would not be to-day any Bill of Rights in the Constitution.

Jefferson was the friend of the farmer, the first to raise his voice against discriminative tariff regulations. Concerning tariff enactments he said that it was unfair to "lay these heavy taxes upon agriculture for the benefit of the manufacturer."

MELLON THE MODERN HAMILTON

How easy it is to see, if one stops seriously to think, that the fight between Hamilton and Jefferson has a counterpart in the fight that is going on to-day in Washington. Senator NORRIS and others are leading forces exactly similar to those led by Jefferson against the encroachments of the big rich, who have as their leader the modern Hamilton, the third richest man in the world, Andrew Mellon, occupying the key place of government in the present national administration.

One of the tricks of those in control of government is to divert attention by giving the public something to chew upon. Just now it is law enforcement, and we are warned of the importance of the citizen obeying the law, and especially not to ignore some law because he does not believe in it. The good citizen is urged to respect and obey the obnoxious law and to ask his relief by agitating its repeal. But it is poor doctrine, as well as a poor rule, that only works one way. Let us see how that applies to some present-day conditions.

All America can't help but be cognizant that the little fellow in trade is being wiped out by the big interests, and everyone knows that nothing is happening in Washington to prevent these consolidations in violation of the antitrust laws, which means that the little merchant will soon be a relic of the past, and all that will be left in the local community will be a mere remittance agent of the big rich interests.

A traveling man made the statement to me the other day that when Peet Bros. consolidated with Palmolive there were 300 traveling men discontinued, and later when Palmolive consolidated with Colgate there were 600 traveling men who lost their jobs, making a total of 900. I met a young man who traveled for J. B. Williams in California, making the barber shops, who said that 82 of the traveling men of J. B. Williams in this particular line of work were laid off, and that he was now living with his brother, and his wife with her mother; and yet the price of soap remains the same as before consolidation. There have been hundreds of such consolidations in the last 15 years, and with every single one of them large groups of wage earners and their families were left without means of support.

I am as well satisfied as that I am alive that the laws that official Washington doesn't want enforced are the antitrust laws, and that the late Senator La Follette was right when he said there hadn't been one hour's honest enforcement of them since they were put on the books.

Official Washington has come to believe that any assault upon the big rich or powerful by those in office would be an assault on government; hence the enforcement of antitrust laws is quietly slumbering while the little business man is being wiped out. Why prosecute the little fellows for ignoring the prohibition law and wink at the big monopolists when they ignore the antitrust laws?

BIG BUSINESS MASKS THE ISSUE

Official Washington makes up for its laxity in enforcing the antitrust laws by a vigorous prosecution of those engaged in the making and sale of a bottle of beer, especially in the South, where the firms usually consist of a white man and a negro. I am told that the purpose of this strange combination of a white man and a black man is that occasionally one of the firm has to go to jail, and for that reason a negro is kept close at hand, so that public opinion and the majesty of the law will be satisfied, and official Washington be able, by facts and figures and percentages, based upon the jailing of unfortunate negroes, to make statistics that will justify officialdom in reporting that it is doing full service at law enforcement.

They tell us, "The worst evil of the disregard for some law is that it destroys respect for all law." What public official at Washington, executive or ministerial, has ever cried out in this fashion against any law aimed at the regulation of big business? If big business does not like the antitrust laws directed against monopolies in restraint of trade and those trust laws that were intended to protect the public which includes the small business man, then is it not the duty of the agents of big business, as honest men, to urge the repeal of these laws and not to encourage their violation by procuring laxity or neglect of enforcement on the part of public officials whose duty it is to enforce these laws, and whose failure to do so thereby creates a contempt for all laws?

Many see evil times ahead. I feel that the remedy is to be found in the teachings of Jefferson. Had his plans on the slave question been followed, there would have been no war between the States. A return to the principles of Jefferson, which would mean the taking the control of government out of the hands of big business and returning it to the people, will prevent something more serious in the way of a disturbance.

Jefferson was always a safe reference in the hour of distress in government. Lincoln found him such. In the great battle of the giants—Lincoln and Douglas—in 1858, Lincoln in the seven debates frequently referred to Jefferson as an authority for what he was doing. In the first debate at Ottawa on August 21, 1858, Lincoln said, in reply to Senator Douglas, "I am fighting upon the original principles; fighting it in the Jeffersonian, Washingtonian, and Madisonian fashion." You will notice that he placed Jefferson before Washington on this occasion, for the reason, I am sure, that he recognized the principles he was fighting for as those of Jefferson primarily.

LETHARGY, FREEDOM'S DEATH KNELL

Jefferson, the great teacher of government, realized that the ear of government was frequently deaf to the call of the people, but he also knew that the people had a remedy that they could make use of in great emergency; when the people were ground to dust by the abuses of the governing power he made no bones of saying, "Let them revolt." He was a staunch friend of the revolutionary principle as an ultimate resort—peaceful if possible; forcible if necessary. Revolution served a double purpose: It kept the government's ear open to a master's voice, and it also sharpened popular attention to what the government was doing. When he got news of Shay's rebellion in Massachusetts and New Hampshire in 1786 he wrote, "I like a little rebellion now and then." This he wrote to Mrs. Adams: "The spirit of resistance to government is so valuable on occasions that I wish it always to be kept alive. It will often be exercised when wrong, but better so than not to be exercised at all. If the happiness of the mass of the people can be secured at the expense of a little tempest now and then, or even of a little blood, it will be a precious purchase." Mr. Jefferson, in Paris with a revolution of the first magnitude, based upon liberty, fraternity, and equality, on the point of breaking about his ears, was scanning the latest accounts of Shay's uprising and writing earnestly to W. S. Smith, "God forbid we should ever be without an occasional rebellion. The people can not all be always well informed. The part which is wrong will be discontented in proportion to the importance of the facts they misconceive. If they remain quiet under such misconceptions it is a lethargy, the forerunner of death to the public liberty."

Big business is always well informed, but it should take notice that if there is a quiet at this period in America's life it is an ominous quiet and one they would do well to heed. Let big business have no misconception concerning the apparent lethargy, because once the people are aroused it will not be death to the public liberty that will ensue, but death to the strangle hold that big business has upon government at Washington, and the result which may well follow would be the taking from those who have so much of this country's wealth in excess of a just and fair proportion for a more equitable distribution. It may also be written in the book of fate that the people will take their Government out of the hands of organized monopoly and privilege, in whose control it has so long been imperiously maintained, and place it again where Jefferson believed it belonged, in the hands of the people of this great commonwealth.

RETIREMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask permission to have published in the RECORD an article from yesterday morning's Washington Post.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Thursday, June 6, 1929]

RACE IS NARROWING FOR HOOVER POSTS—WITH RETIREMENT OF DOCTOR WORK, ONLY FOUR ARE LEFT IN INNER GROUP—SUPPORTERS FALLING OFF

With the retirement of Chairman Hubert Work, that inner group of zealous workers that elected President Hoover has now apparently narrowed down to the survival of the fittest.

One by one persons who either spent the campaign close in Hoover's private councils or rent the countryside with their eulogies have dropped away. First there was Senator BROOKHART, of Iowa, who made more than 200 speeches asserting that Mr. Hoover was the farmers' best friend and then in the Senate a few weeks ago blatantly acknowledging his disappointment.

He was followed by Senator BORAH, and there is reason to believe that the Idaho Senator's defection is to be more pronounced in a few days.

In succession Col. William J. Donovan, Col. Horace Mann, and Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt have withdrawn from the official fireside.

ALWAYS WELCOME AT LUNCH

One and all they are welcomed at the White House for luncheon or dinner almost any time; but thwarted ambitions, disappointments, and the general keenness of the race have caused them to step out of the official picture.

Indeed, only four of the crowd remains. They will compete for the final honors, so to speak, and it is a question who will emerge victorious.

Walter Newton, of the White House secretariat, is holding his own, hotfooting it between the executive offices and Capitol Hill as he does, going out of nights and mixing with the right kind of people, and generally about as active as anyone who ever came down the pike.

Secretary of War Good has not been much heard of since becoming a Cabinet member, and on appearances would seem to be at a political disadvantage, but no one who knows him doubts that his sage counsel is ever at the President's ear.

BROWN STRENGTHENS HOLD IN SOUTH

Quietly and seemingly alone, Postmaster General Brown has gone out in his practical way to build up a Southern organization for 1932, undoubtedly for Mr. Hoover's use in the first instance, and maybe for himself as Vice President.

But he has made a debacle out of Mr. Hoover's idealistic southern situation. With one exception, he has turned his back on the original Hoover workers who were massed in these States under Colonel Mann, and has recognized groups set up as blinds by the forces that Mr. Hoover originally intended to disown. And with this one exception, instead of the Republicans building up a strong organization in the various States, there has developed more factionalism than ever before. The exception is Florida, where order has been fairly established in spite of Mr. Brown.

Texas and Virginia have, of course, not come under his wing.

There was nothing in the day's development to change the first conclusion that Doctor Work's withdrawal, while not in a huff of any sort, was influenced by a general weariness with the way things were going, together with the philosophy that, after all, he was getting too old to worry about them.

DECLINE CABINET POSTS

There was an authoritative statement that he had been offered either the postmaster generalship or another Cabinet place, and declined. There is no reason to believe that this is not true.

Another story that was given considerable credence was that he disapproved of the policy of sending Cabinet members out to attack the Senate. This, of course, was not serious enough to provoke his resignation, but it is entirely possible that in his practical way the doctor disapproved of the attacks on the Senate.

Representative FORT, of New Jersey, more vigorous and younger, and used to seeing the big stick wielded in the House, is said to be the author of the plan.

Whoever the plan belongs to, the first attack delivered by Secretary of the Navy Adams has done no good. It has been explained by administration explainers that it could have possibly done no harm in that the only Senators who would take offense are the Progressives and Democrats, who are against the administration anyhow.

ATTACK INCREASES RESENTMENT

But it has done this harm. It has heightened their resentment. It has, to cite a case in point, increased their determination for the debenture in the farm bill. There may be a break in their ranks after a while, but the debenture proposal is in for a good delay because of their attitude.

There is considerable speculation concerning Work's successor, but inasmuch as it is two months or more off before he retires, it is doubtful if the President has given it much thought. And speculation to-day runs the hazard of further eliminations that may come as the race for the place at the right hand of the throne enters its final phase.

INTERFERENCE WITH THE RIGHTS OF SENATOR HEFLIN

Mr. HEFLIN, in presenting the petition, given below, said: Mr. President, these petitioners reside in 56 towns in Massachusetts. I ask that the petition, including the names and list of towns, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

We, the undersigned citizens of Massachusetts, do hereby respectfully petition United States Senator from Massachusetts GILLETT to support and vote for the passage of the resolution of Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN, Senator from Alabama, which calls upon the Senate of the United States of America to condemn and repudiate the reprehensible and criminal conduct of those who sought to assault and do violence to the person of said Hon. FRANCO-AMERICAN FILM CONTROVERSY

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a telegraphic dispatch from Paris which appeared in the New York Times on June 3 and a news item from the Washington Herald of June 6, after which I desire to submit a few remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the New York Times of June 3, 1929]

FILM QUOTA AT ONCE PARIS'S REPORTED AIM—PRODUCERS PRESS GOVERNMENT TO ENFORCE 4 TO 1 PLAN—INTERPELLATION TO BE MADE IN CHAMBER

PARIS, June 2.—The Franco-American film controversy, which is now in the hands of the respective Governments, took a more serious turn to-day with strong but unconfirmed rumors that the French Government was preparing to place in effect in the near future the 4 to 1 contingent or quota measure to which the American industry, backed by the State Department, has taken such strenuous exception and by which American producers would have to buy one French picture for every four American pictures exhibited in France. A 7 to 1 quota is now in effect.

The film question was discussed at cabinet meetings both Friday and yesterday, and it was understood that under ordinary procedure the recommendations of the French Cinema Syndicate urging the contingent plan would have been referred to a committee for further discussion before any action was taken.

[From the Washington Herald, June 6, 1929]

FILM MAKERS HINT BOYCOTT IN FRANCE

The State Department, at the request of domestic motion-picture film interests, yesterday instructed the American Embassy in Paris to inform the French Government that American films will be withdrawn from the French market if the 4 to 1 quota goes into effect.

The quota at present is 7 to 1, whereby for every 7 American films introduced into France 1 French film must be accepted in the United States.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, the clerk has read two excerpts from the New York Times and the Washington Herald of and concerning a matter of very grave importance to American industry.

It is gratifying to note that our State Department is giving attention to this altogether indefensible interference with legitimate commerce between friendly nations. It is to be hoped that our Government will make it perfectly plain to France that we do not look with indifference on this threatened attack on a great American industry, and that if that great industry is discriminated against and barred out of France by regulations and demands amounting to an embargo, we shall find ways and means to convince that Republic of the unwisdom and folly of her legislation.

The motion-picture industry is one of the outstanding phenomena of our age, remarkable as that age is for advancement in discovery and invention, in science and the useful arts. Although but little over 30 years old, that industry directly employs in America more than 325,000 people. In the manufacture, distribution, and exhibition of motion pictures it gives employment to over a million and a quarter Americans.

A great army of artists and skilled workmen carry on this American industry, and by their genius and labor contribute not only to the education and pleasure of the people but to the material benefit of allied industries and to the Nation at large.

A vast amount of capital is invested in this industry, in the making of pictures, in their distribution, in theaters specially designed for their exhibition.

Nor is this all that may be said to show the importance of this American industry. The American motion picture is America's most efficient commercial agent, spreading abroad into foreign lands information as to our resources and the salable products of our factories and fields.

It is because of the immense importance of this American industry, thus briefly—and, of course, only briefly—suggested, that I call attention to the threatened attack on it, an attack which, if not averted, means the barring out of American pictures from France.

Senators will naturally ask me what is the nature of this attack. What is this "4 to 1" quota plan that France threatens to put into operation? It is this: Each producer of a motion picture in France, whether the picture be good, bad, or indifferent, will receive four licenses to import foreign films. This plan is known as the "4 to 1" contingent or quota system. American producers will be required to purchase—note this—one French picture for every four American pictures exhibited in France. In other words, for every four American pictures imported into France for exhibition, one French picture must be purchased by the American producers.

Now, it so happens that our superior motion pictures are very popular in France; there is a market for them there; whereas the French motion pictures do not attract American audiences.

Hitherto we have been compelled to buy at exorbitant price 1 French picture, however valueless, for every 7 American pictures sent into France for exhibition. This was bad enough, but now we are called on to buy 1 French picture for every 4 American pictures sent to that country for exhibition.

If this ingenious plan, scheme, system—call it what you will—is enforced a French embargo on American motion pictures is declared!

I concede the unquestioned and unquestionable right of France to impose such a tariff on American imported pictures as she thinks necessary for the protection and encouragement of her motion-picture industry. Indeed, to-day—this day—in the exercise of that right France imposes a tariff on our motion pictures substantially twice the amount our Government imposes on imported French pictures.

I concede her equally recognized right to impose license and internal taxes on American pictures and to make rules and regulations for their exhibition in France, placing our pictures on an equality in these respects with those of other nations; but I protest against her attempt to force American producers to purchase her pictures at arbitrary prices and regardless of their exhibition value as a precedent condition for the entry of American pictures into France.

I indulge in the belief that upon a little reflection France will see the unwisdom, perhaps danger, of her 4 to 1 plan to encourage her motion-picture industry.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator, does he know of any other instance in the history of commerce or trade where such a condition has been imposed?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am not aware of any nation which has ever adopted or undertaken to enforce such a scheme, plan, or system to aid its export trade.

Mr. COPELAND. It seems to me an amazing thing that a nation by such a condition should attempt to force another people to take something which perhaps they do not want—I am not speaking at all in disparagement of the French pictures—and to require them to buy, whether they wish to do so or not. I think the Senator is to be commended for making the statement to the Senate and to the country, in order that all concerned may be advised of what the situation is.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I am somewhat surprised at the attitude of my friend the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. I do not see any difference in morals—indeed, if moralities exist they would be in favor of France—between measures which we have enacted oftentimes which were a complete embargo of goods and products from foreign countries and a proposition which says, "We shall not embargo your products but we ask some little reciprocity."

Mr. Taft, when President of the United States, favored a reciprocity treaty with Canada under the terms of which our exports to Canada were to be reciprocally benefited by an exchange of commodities between the two countries. We have many evidences of American legislation constituting an embargo against foreign imports. France is not embargoing American films; she merely says, "Permit us to have some reciprocity."

I am very glad to welcome my friend from California to the list of those who believe that embargoes are not for the best interests of any country; and I shall be glad to have him join hands with some of us, when the tariff bill comes before the Senate, in opposing the embargoes which the House bill contains, and which some American manufacturers desire to increase.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his very thoughtful and courteous remarks. If he heard me—and I take pleasure in thinking that he did—I stated that I very cheerfully concede the unquestioned and, with me, unquestionable right of any sovereign nation to impose such a tariff on imports as it thinks makes for its benefit. That is not a concession but the admission of a manifest recognized right of any nation; and I believe in that doctrine as applied immediately to the United States. But that is not the question here involved at all; and I do not desire to digress or be diverted into a colloquy or discussion of collateral or unrelated matters. I am calling attention to a situation which injuriously affects an American industry.

At the expense of time, I will repeat. I indulge in the belief that upon a little reflection France will see the unwisdom—perhaps danger—of her 4 to 1 plan to encourage her motion-picture industry. Suppose other nations should adopt a like plan or policy and enforce it against France. Suppose that for every four Michelin tires imported into the United States one American-made tire, at any price the manufacturer might demand, had to be purchased by the French. Suppose that for every four articles of French manufacture—dresses, hats, perfumes, and so forth—one like article of American manufacture, regardless of merit or price, had to be purchased by the French.

Why, Mr. President, if the United States, or any other industrial nation, should adopt such an unwise and uneconomic plan or policy, the tears of France would cause the Seine to overflow its banks.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. I am asking merely for information. The regulation, as I understand it, is that for every four films brought in from the United States, one French film shall be purchased. How is the selection made of that one? Is it at the option of the American producer?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is left somewhat indefinite, I may say.

Mr. BURTON. Then, the American producer might purchase the very cheapest film on the market; might he not?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is subject, however, to rules and regulations put in force by France; and just whether we would be obliged to buy a particular picture or not I am not able now definitely to answer.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption? I apologize for taking his time further.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator know that the Film Trust—and it is a trust—of the United States has been under investigation for some time by the Department of Justice and by the Federal Trade Commission, and one of the allegations of its delinquency rests upon the proposition that in order for the purchasers, the exhibitors in the Senator's town and in my town and in the little towns to get an up-to-date picture, they are compelled to buy a large number of worn-out and effete pictures, and that practice is engaged in and indulged in by this trust which the Senator is now eulogizing?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; I am not eulogizing a trust, nor am I at present concerned with the subject matter referred to by my distinguished friend, the Senator from Utah. Whether this great industry, in which many corporations and individuals are interested, is doing anything in violation of our laws, I am not now asserting or denying, nor discussing. I assume that those having jurisdiction over the matter will seek the truth, and that the truth will be fully sufficient to exonerate—I indulge in that thought—this industry from the charges made.

Mr. KING. Let us hope the truth will prevail.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And the truth shall make us free.

On reliable information from French sources I am warranted in asserting that the "7 to 1" quota plan to enforce exports was not helpful but hurtful to the French industry; that it resulted in inferior French pictures that found no natural market in foreign countries; and therefore I am justified in predicting that if this proposed "4 to 1" plan is enforced it will not only bar American pictures from France but will practically destroy the French industry.

If France wants good pictures—and undoubtedly she does—we have them to sell.

Mr. SMOOT. In California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And, as my scholarly friend from Utah says, we have them in California for sale and exhibition. If France, I say, wants good pictures—and undoubtedly she does—we have them here, manufactured in the United States; and if she ever learns to make superior pictures, America will buy them. But we have set a high standard, and will not be forced to buy her pictures, silent or speaking, that our people do not enjoy and will not patronize.

Mr. President, I have taken the liberty of calling attention to this matter in no spirit of hostility to France, the country we owe so much, but which owes us vastly more.

Without any feeling or spirit of hostility I have made these brief remarks preliminary to offering the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 87), as follows:

> Whereas the French Government is considering the enforcement of a plan known as the "4 to 1" contingent or quota measure applying to the importation into France of American-made motion pictures, and the State Department has instructed the American Embassy in France to protest such plan: Therefore be it
> Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of such protest and copies of any and all communications or correspondence relating thereto.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator does not ask that the resolution be considered now, I understand.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh, no.

Mr. KING. Because, if so, I want an opportunity to have it amended.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from California did not ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. KING. I feel that we should, perhaps, ask for information with respect to measures which we propose for an embargo upon imports brought into the United States. If we are going to go into the matter of any tariff by other nations which may impede our sales in foreign lands, let us consider at the same time what we are doing and may do and propose to do for the purpose of cutting off our trade with other nations, and preventing a reasonable exchange of our commodities with our friends across the seas who may have commodities to sell to us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over under the rule.

SCHEDULE OF TARIFF HEARINGS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the thousands of letters and the hundreds of personal inquiries that I have received as to when the hearings on the tariff shall begin, and the schedules of the subcommittees, I have prepared a statement which I wish to have go into the RECORD. I also wish at this particular time—it will take just a few minutes—to call attention to the dates of the hearings and the membership of the subcommittees:

MEETING DATES FOR HEARINGS OF SUBCOMMITTEES OF FINANCE COMMITTEE ON THE TARIFF BILL

	Commence hearings on—
Valuation, full committee	June 12
SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 1—ROOM 212, SENATE OFFICE BUILDING
Schedule 1—Chemicals, oils, and paints—Smoot, Edge, Reed, King, Barkley	June 14
Schedule 2—Earths, earthenware, glassware—Edge, Reed, Smoot, King, Barkley	June 19
Schedule 3—Metals and manufactures of—Reed, Smoot, Edge, King, Barkley	June 24

SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 2—ROOM 312, SENATE OFFICE BUILDING

	Commence hearings on—
Schedule 6—Tobacco and manufactures of—Shortridge, Watson, Smoot, Harrison, Connally	June 13
Schedule 8—Spirits, wines, and other beverages—Shortridge, Smoot, Watson, Harrison, Connally	June 14
Schedule 7—Agricultural products and provisions—Watson, Smoot, Shortridge, Harrison, Connally	June 17
Schedule 5—Sugar, molasses, and manufactures of—Smoot, Shortridge, Watson, Harrison, Connally	June 24

SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 3—ROOM 303, SENATE OFFICE BUILDING

Schedule 9—Cotton manufactures—Bingham, Greene, Sackett, Simmons, George	June 14
Schedule 10—Flax, hemp, jute, and manufactures of—Greene, Sackett, Bingham, Simmons, George	June 19
Schedule 11—Wool and manufactures of—Bingham, Greene, Sackett, Simmons, George	June 24
Schedule 12—Silk and silk goods—Sackett, Bingham, Greene, Simmons, George	July 1 (2 p. m.)
Schedule 13—Rayon manufactures—Sackett, Bingham, Greene, Simmons, George	July 8

SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 4—ROOM 412, SENATE OFFICE BUILDING

Schedule 14—Papers and books—Deneen, Keyes, Couzens, Walsh (Mass.), Thomas (Okla.)	June 13
Schedule 4—Wood and manufactures—Couzens, Deneen, Keyes, Walsh (Mass.), Thomas (Okla.)	June 17
Schedule 15—Sundries—Keyes, Deneen, Couzens, Walsh (Mass.), Thomas (Okla.)	June 24

NOTE.—All meetings will commence at 9.30 a. m. unless otherwise noted. Free list (Schedule 16) will be considered by full committee after conclusion of subcommittee hearings.

Administrative and miscellaneous provisions will be considered by full committee at conclusion of subcommittee hearings.

I wish to say to the members of the subcommittees that I have arranged to have a stenographic reporter present to report the hearings before each subcommittee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator what committee will consider the question of importations of manufactured machinery?

Mr. McKELLAR. Machinery for textile mills, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. That comes under metal and manufactures of metal. It is Schedule 3; and the subcommittee consists of Senators REED, SMOOT, EDGE, KING, and BARKLEY. The hearings on Schedule 3 will begin on June 24, and will be held in room 212, Senate Office Building.

Mr. McKELLAR. On June 24?

Mr. SMOOT. On June 24.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator read again the names of the members of that committee?

Mr. SMOOT. Senators REED, SMOOT, EDGE, KING, and BARKLEY.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think my colleague should state that these schedules—that is, so far as the assignments of Democrats are concerned—were prepared by my colleague and by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] after the latter had conferred with the Democratic members of the Finance Committee; so that those assignments and allocations are made with the approval of the Democratic members of the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senate that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] handed me personally the names for each of the subcommittees just as I have read them.

Mr. KING. I wanted to acquit my colleague and my Republican friends from the charge that they had autocratically made up these schedules and these assignments of Democratic Members.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; that never can be charged against the Republican Party. The only autocratic action taken in regard to the tariff bill is taken when the Democrats have a bill in their hands. Then the Republicans are never allowed to see the bill until it is ready to be voted upon.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my colleague must not make that statement. I was complimenting him and my Republican friends, in order that no newspaper man or others might feel, in view of his first statement, that this presentation was solely the product of the Republicans. I wanted to say that the Democrats assented to these assignments; and I was paying a compliment to him and to my Republican friends, instead of criticizing them.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps I misunderstood the statement. I took it in rather a different spirit, and that is the reason why I made the answer that I did.

Mr. KING. I think my friend ought to have perceived the compliment which I intended to convey.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 312) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. CHINDBLOM, Mr. FENN, Mr. McLEOD, Mr. RANKIN, and Mr. LOZIER were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF THE IMMIGRATION ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 37) submitted by Mr. NYE April 23, 1929, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 151) to repeal the national-origins provisions of the immigration act of 1924.

Mr. BURTON obtained the floor.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. NYE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen	Frazier	King	Sheppard
Ashurst	George	La Follette	Shortridge
Barkley	Gillett	McKellar	Smith
Bingham	Glass	McMaster	Smoot
Blease	Glenn	McNary	Steiwer
Bratton	Goff	Metcalf	Swanson
Brookhart	Goldsborough	Moses	Thomas, Idaho
Broussard	Greene	Norris	Thomas, Okla.
Burton	Harris	Nye	Townsend
Capper	Harrison	Oddie	Trammell
Caraway	Hastings	Overman	Tydings
Connally	Hatfield	Patterson	Tyson
Copeland	Hawes	Phipps	Vandenberg
Couzens	Hebert	Pine	Wagner
Cutting	Heflin	Pittman	Walcott
Dale	Howell	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
Deneen	Johnson	Reed	Warren
Dill	Jones	Robinson, Ark.	Waterman
Edge	Kean	Sackett	Watson
Fletcher	Keyes	Schall	Wheeler

Mr. BURTON. My colleague [Mr. FESS] is necessarily absent on account of illness.

Mr. SCHALL. My colleague [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is detained on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, on the 29th of April last the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] made some remarks here in the Senate of a disparaging nature in regard to immigrants from western Asia and southeastern Europe. I read the pertinent portion:

> For a long time before the war broke out in Europe this country was the trash basket of Europe. We were sent thousands of immigrants who were excused from penitentiary sentences on condition that they would emigrate to America. We got the trash of the Mediterranean, all that Levantine stock that churns around through there and does not know what its own ancestry is. It came here in large numbers from Syria and the Turkish Provinces and from different countries of the Balkan Peninsula and from all that part of southeastern Europe.

This sweeping condemnation seems to include the Syrians, and very naturally the community of Syrians in northern Ohio have protested against such an attack as this. Of my own acquaintance with them I shall wish to speak in a few minutes, but I would ask at this time that the clerk read the protest filed by the Syrian American Club of Cleveland.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE SYRIAN AMERICAN CLUB,
Cleveland, Ohio, June 3, 1929.

Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON,
Senate of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Beg to call your attention to a certain discussion which is reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 29, 1929, issue, on page 638, while the Committee on Immigration was considering and proposing remedies and solutions on the question involving the adoption of an ultimate ratio with respect to controlling the flow of immigration into this country.

We note with much surprise and indignation that during that discussion the Hon. Senator DAVID REED, in expressing his views on the immediate question and in pointing out nationality preferences, desirables, and undesirables, uttered and cast a most insulting and disparaging remark against the Syrian people when he referred to them as being "the trash of the Mediterranean."

The undersigned committee, on behalf of the Syrian American Club of Cleveland, Ohio, and as representing the Syrians in the State of Ohio, desires to voice through you, as our able and skilled representative in the Senate from this State, their vigorous protests against the Senator's injudicious and violent attack upon the Syrian people.

We are unaware and have not been able to place our finger tips on any excusable fact or theory upon which the Senator might have based his indiscreet statement, and, moreover, the Senator did not adduce any reason or cause as a motive for such an utterance.

It can not be contradicted that the Syrian element in these glorious United States is one of the most loyal, peaceful, and law-abiding citizens constituting the long-sought and continued ideals of this country and preserving its Constitution, nourished and sponsored by our noble and great American forefathers.

Can the Senator's condemnation of the Syrian people be based on any immoral, criminal, disloyalty, or deviations from the cardinal principles binding this country? No; he can not.

Therefore, Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON, the Senator's statement is biased, prejudicial, ungrounded, and irrational.

Further, for your own information, and should you desire to search the judicial dockets and records of every branch of the judiciary, you will marvel at its disclosure, for you will find the number of Syrian criminals or penal violators of Syrian parentage very negligible. You will neither find many more than what you can count on your fingers dependent upon our benevolent American eleemosynary institutions. With these facts facing us and the whole world, can any prudent or diligent person justifiably attack or denounce the worthiness of any Syrian who is willing to swear fidelity and allegiance to the Stars and Stripes of a great, united, and God-loving country as America?

Trusting that we have submitted to you our cause and complaint in good faith on behalf of the Syrian people, not only in this State of Ohio but all over the Nation, for the unjust wrong that has branded them, we remain ever loyal and citizens of a great democracy, the United States.

Very truly yours,

THE GOOD AND WELFARE COMMITTEE,
JESS N. SABA, Chairman.
JAMES SOLOMON.
MICHAEL CARABOOLAD.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, as I said, I am acquainted with many of the Syrian people in northern Ohio, and I may say for them that their names very rarely appear in the criminal court records. They are industrious, law-abiding, and patriotic. As soon as possible they become naturalized American citizens. Their children are taking an honorable place in the public schools and they, whether as merchants, laborers, or in whatever capacity, are becoming an integral and helpful part in our cosmopolitan population. I much regret the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and at the same time I must say that the letter just read is a little stronger in some of its adjectives than I would altogether approve, but it is very natural that the writers should be extremely sensitive about the attack and should answer with some degree of bitterness.

In regard to the general proposition pending, it seems to me best that we adopt legislation postponing the operation of the national-origins plan and give to the subject of immigration a very careful consideration. Our immigration laws and policies are seriously in need of adjustment. I can not see my way clear to vote for the national-origins plan. It seems to me that the plan based on the census of 1890 is, in the first place, very much more practicable in its application and is more thoroughly representative of the citizenship of the United States at this time. An unfortunate issue has been raised in the way of accusation that racial prejudice is involved in one plan or the other. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to eulogize this or that nationality. In the adjustment of immigrants coming to this country and to American life there has been a very wide difference in the promptness with which those coming from abroad have become real American citizens. Indeed there are certain classes, especially from Asia, that we felt it necessary to exclude altogether. But no man can deny that in peace and in war in all the various activities of American life the immigrant who has come to this country through all the period of American growth has made a very valuable contribution to the upbuilding of the country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it seems to be impossible to discuss immigration restriction without arousing the feelings of a great number of sensitive groups and hypersensitive groups. I never said that the Syrian people were the trash of the Mediterranean, and anyone who reads my statements will see that I did not. I said that from all around the shores of the Mediterranean came the trash of that region and that they came from the Turkish Provinces and from Syria and from all the other countries which I could have listed. That is true. Everyone who hears my voice at this moment knows that it is true. But it is equally true that I made no reflection whatsoever upon the Syrians as a race or as an immigrant strain.

Anyone who undertakes to debate the subject of immigration restriction will find himself the unlucky victim of that kind of misconstruction. He will be accused of a racial prejudice of which he is wholly unconscious. Sometimes the accusation will be made to curry favor with the people in question and sometimes it will be made because of their hypersensitiveness. I have said in every speech I have ever made on immigration that we can treat this question only in the spirit of the Declaration of Independence that all men were born equal, and that remark is always included, and invariably an effort is made to introduce questions of race prejudice. If America is to legislate soundly on this subject it can not be done in that spirit.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the discussion of this question has at least served one good purpose. It has brought to the attention of the American people the fact that there is a strong and a powerful organized effort to break down restricted immigration into the United States. Certain foreign forces are at work. Their influence is being felt here at the Capitol. They have become so bold and arrogant that they dare now to tell the people of the United States who shall come and how many shall come each year to this great Government that we call ours.

I hold in my hand a copy of the issue of the Chicago Tribune of May 21 last, and the headline of the article from which I shall quote reads: Hands off Immigration Law. Then the article says:

> Restriction of immigration is necessary for the welfare of this country, and has become the corner stone of American nationalism.

Mr. President, that does not appeal to the person who is going to be influenced by foreign elements, but the day is coming and it is not far distant when the people of the Nation are going to rise up and demand of their Senators that they represent them and that they look to the welfare of this country and that they shall not be coerced and intimidated by foreign elements already here, and by the force of a foreign element that hopes soon to be here.

At another place in the article it says:

> Immigration into our country is no other country's business.

And that is true. We are to determine who shall come here, and just how many shall come. We have a right to shut them all out if we want to do so, and I do not know but that the day is near at hand when we will do that, at least for a time, until we can find out just what we have in the United States.

Senators, this is a serious question. When I first came to Congress there were being shipped into this country over a million foreigners a year. They were coming from southern Europe more than from any other section. I have been in Congress 24 years. At that rate we would have had poured into our country in my brief time in public life fully 25,000,000 of those people. I, with others in the House from the South and West, saw the necessity for restricted immigration.

I had not been in the House very long until under the leadership of a brave Alabaman, John Burnett, of the seventh congressional district, who had become chairman of the Committee on Immigration, we started a vigorous fight to restrict immigration. We passed the bill, but President Taft vetoed it, and I do not hesitate to say to you that I believe it was the Roman influence here and foreign influences that caused him to veto it.

Then later, when the Democrats were in power, we passed another immigration bill and President Wilson vetoed it, and I do not hesitate to say that the same Roman and foreign influences caused him to veto it. Senators, this influence is tremendous and dangerous in the United States. The time is here for all good Americans to wake up and demand that the American citizen be considered in questions of this kind. What right have any group to sit in their secret councils in foreign lands and dictate the immigration policy of the United States? Do they do it? Let me read to you further from this article:

> 1. That the campaign for the postponement or repeal of the national-origins provision of the immigration act was begun by persons formerly associated with a publication subsidized by a foreign government.
> 2. That the publication which claims the credit for arousing the foreign-language press in the United States against the national-origins quota system is actively engaged in promoting the political interests of a foreign nation to-day.

Senators, do you get the full meaning of what this paper is suggesting? Are you giving consideration to the problem it presents—"promoting the political interests of a foreign nation in the United States?"

3. That foreign language press and foreign bloc leaders who can only thrive on a continuing fresh supply of immigrants who do not speak our language have spread numerous gross misrepresentations about the national-origins provision among their followers.

4. That foreign steamship companies have lent their facilities for the organization of political opposition to the national-origins provisions.

Senators, do you get the full purport of that statement? Well do I recall our experience in the House with the steamship companies when we first began the fight for restricted immigration. Why, America had become the dumping ground for the criminal refuse of every country on the globe and they were being sent here at the rate of a million and a quarter a year. America was furnishing means for the steamship companies to make hundreds of thousands of dollars. They were bringing shipload after shipload and they were dumping them in upon our shores and adding to our troubles and increasing our burdens while the steamship companies were making money hand over fist. I recall that it developed in the debates in the House that they had their agents in foreign countries who were going through foreign countries with pictures of savings banks in the United States and of boys and girls who had recently come over from the foreign lands working in factories here, making money, running with their hands full of bills to deposit them in the banks. "America is the land of milk and honey. Get your tickets and go to America." They were flooding our country. Such an influx of foreigners had never come to this land before. We said something must be done to stop it. We went to work to stop it.

As I have said, we passed a bill to stop it, but President Taft vetoed it. We kept on fighting. We rallied our forces, Democrats and Republicans alike, from the West and the South, and we passed it again, and President Wilson vetoed it. But we fought on and on and succeeded in passing the immigration bill again and President Coolidge signed it.

It is the best immigration law that we have had in 50 years. It protects the rights and interests of the American people, and we are now trying to keep American guards at the gates to prevent this influx of foreigners from coming again. But here they are coming again in a round-about way, making the shrewdest sort of attempt, as the Senator from Pennsylvania said, to break down the barrier against immigration, to tear down the law that we now have.

I well remember the speech of Representative Burnett of Alabama in the House of Representatives. He told about being in Sicily years ago and asking the natives, "What has become of all the bandits that used to give you so much trouble?" And they answered, "They have all gone to the United States."

Mr. President, those were dangerous days for our country, and we are still suffering from the loose immigration laws that afflicted our people in those evil days. The agents representing the steamship companies, as I said, and other interests, were going through foreign lands and telling the people, "The ship will sail at a certain time; get ready; get your tickets and go to America." They were drumming them up until immigration reached the enormous figure of 1,300,000 a year. I have no apology to make for the part I played in the House of Representatives and in the Senate in preventing such a colossal and inexcusable number of foreigners from coming into our country.

Now that we have a law that is a good law, in the name of our country and all that is dear to us as Americans let us stand by that law.

I desire to ask who is it now that is fighting this national-origins plan? We find the steamship companies on that side. I had a letter the other day—the first one of the kind that I have received from my State—urging me to vote for the repeal of the national-origins clause. It was from a steamship company at Mobile, Ala. Mr. President, the great steamship companies along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts want to get back into the lucrative business which they had in the days to which I have referred when they were bringing hundreds and thousands of shiploads of foreigners and dumping them into the body of our citizenship, trafficking in the transportation of foreigners to the hurt and injury of our own country. We found organized bands of criminals emerging from many of these newly arrived foreign groups—kidnapers, blackhanders, gangsters, and racketeers. And they are robbing and terrorizing legitimate business in the United States, and making life miserable for hundreds and thousands of our people. Still a group of those people in somebody's State brings pressure to bear to vote to change the national-origins provision of the immigration law.

Senators, the people are reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD more than they have ever before read it in my lifetime; they know what is going on here. Because we do not hear much from them some Senators take it as a matter of course that the people do not know the situation here and that they will vote for them, but when the citizens of America see that this outside influence, this foreign element, is dominating Senators here and controlling their vote on this important American question, they are going to want somebody else to come here who will speak the American language and stand by American ideals and institutions. They are not going to be imposed on in this fashion always. This paper continues:

5. That the ambassador of a foreign nation to the United States in an address delivered while on a visit to his own country credited the first postponement of national origins to the hyphenated Americans of his own nationality.

He boasted that this foreign influence was strong enough in the United States to prevent the national origins act from going into effect for two years. Think of that astounding situation! The ambassador of that nation back home boasting to his people when perhaps he thought we would never hear of it that he and they were responsible for keeping an American law, enacted by the Congress, from going into effect for two years because they did not want it to go into effect.

Then the paper further states:

How long will you tolerate foreign propaganda as an agency in molding American legislation? The time has come for the American people to end hyphenism! Let Washington hear from the American people. Wire or write to-day the President of the United States and your Senators—CHARLES S. DENEEN and OTIS F. GLENN—that you are opposed to the repeal or suspension of the national-origins clause of the immigration act of 1924. Keep America American.

Mr. President, the statement that I have read discloses the need for a general awakening on the part of Americans everywhere. Foreign intrigue and alien influences are becoming more active and more dangerous every day. The time to combat these un-American influences is now.

Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty; being on guard eternally is what is going to preserve this Government in its true American form. We can not do it in any other way. We have got to put wide-awake, strong Americans on guard here and in other important places.

If Senators will not reflect the American sentiment then their constituencies ought to send Senators here who will. If a Senator in this body is going to be influenced by a group in his State that represents the foreign viewpoint, who want him to vote to repeal the present immigration law, then it is time for the people of his State, those who are actuated by American principles and interests, to deal with him at the polls and send somebody here whose dominating desire and purpose is to serve and safeguard the interests of his own country. Senators, some of you do not seem to know what is going on in this country. The red-handed Mussolini of Rome now has his Fascist organizations at work in this Nation. I told the Senate once before about a convention of Roman Catholics, Italian Fascists, held at Philadelphia a few months ago. These so-called American citizens in a Mussolini Fascist convention at Philadelphia sent Mussolini a cablegram pledging him allegiance and stating they were ready at all times to obey his commands.

Here is a press despatch sent me by Italian Protestants in New York. It reads:

Count di Revel accused. Anti-Fascists in the United States protest alleged espionage system.

Letters addressed to President Hoover and Members of the United States Senate protesting against the activities of Count Thaon di Revel, Fascist propaganda agent in the United States, were released yesterday by the American Friends of Italian Freedom, an organization opposed to Fascism.

The letter pointed out that Count di Revel was organizing young Americans, sons of Italians, into junior Fascist organizations and was preventing Americanization of the Italians in the United States.

Think of that, Senators! These foreign agents have intruded themselves into the very temple of American liberty and here at the altar place the Fascist agents of Mussolini are administering a foreign oath to the sons of American Italians and binding them in allegiance to Mussolini, the Catholic tyrant dictator of Rome. That brazen and dangerous performance is going on right here in the United States. Are Senators afraid to discuss it and condemn it, because of the active alien influences in their States? Here are American patriots of Italian blood, who love our flag, who want to be let alone, and who want their sons let alone by these foreign influences. They are complaining about it and asking to be relieved of it. Their American sons are sought out by the agents of Mussolini of Italy and being organized into Fascist societies, pledging allegiance not to the American flag. No, no; but allegiance to Mussolini and his Roman Fascist régime in Italy. That, Senators, is going on to-day right here in the United States of America. Are we going to close our eyes and submit to such dangerous doing, or are we going to do what we should do and drive these unwelcome, brazen, and dangerous emissaries of Mussolini out of our country?

I want to repeat the last sentence in this statement:

> The letters pointed out that Count di Revel was organizing young Americans, sons of Italians, into junior Fascist organizations and was preventing Americanization of the Italians in the United States.

These Protestant Americans of Italian blood want their boys to be whole-hearted Americans, and they ought to encouraged; they do not want them to be tampered with by these foreign influences; they want to train them up in the way they should go as real Americans; but here is Mussolini's agents interfering with them and preventing the Americanization of these boys in America, sons of American citizens. If an American should go to Italy and attempt to pledge Italian boys to allegiance to the United States, Mussolini would have him shot at sunrise.

The statement I have just read is enough to arouse to determined action every Senator in this body; it is enough to stir with indignation the heart of every Member of the House. Mussolini's Fascist agents over here in the United States actively at work organizing American boys into Fascist societies and interfering with the efforts of their American fathers to make of them good Americans.

We want no divided allegiance here. Mr. Lincoln once said, and said truly, "The Nation can not exist half free and half slave." This Nation will not long do well and prosper with a large portion of its population giving support and holding allegiance to any foreign Pope or power.

The time is coming, Senators, and it will not be long when the American people back in the States that sent us here are going to demand of their Senators singleness of purpose and whole-hearted service—not to foreign groups and countries—but to the American Government. The time will come when he who lifts his voice here for the preservation of his own country will be supported by the Senators who will be here then. My duty to the truth and to my country compels me to say that there are a number of them here now who are a little nervous and gun-shy of this foreign influence. They back off and side-step if possible, if Roman Catholic interests are involved. Some tremble like an aspen leaf, and look as if they were going to have a chill in midsummer. [Laughter.]

Well, that will not be so always, for the people back home are coming to know just what is going on here. The time is not far distant when there must be and will be a different order of things. I want to say, as I have said many times before, that I have no prejudice against anybody's "religion." I do not care what it is.

I want all the people to worship just as they choose to worship, but I do not intend that any religious group, through attempted disguise or otherwise, shall bring its political activities to the point where they endanger the sacred institutions of "religious freedom," "separation of church and state," "free speech," "peaceful assembly," "free press," and the "public-school system" in America. These are the six mighty pillars that rest beneath the great structure of the American Government, and anybody who undertakes to pull out those pillars is an enemy to our Government; I do not care whether he is a Roman Catholic, a Protestant, or a Jew.

Mr. President, when I discuss this subject and point out facts that all patriotic Americans should know, facts that nobody can answer because they are the eternal truth, every Roman Catholic paper in the country says, "Senator HEFLIN attacks the Catholic Church." I have not attacked the church. When they say that, they are admitting for themselves that the Catholic Church is doing the things that I have charged to Roman Catholic political activities. The two may be mighty closely allied. This Roman Catholic political machine may be so closely allied with the Roman heirarchy that it is hard to distinguish the one from the other. But, Mr. President, I repeat, I do not care how a man approaches his Creator, whether on his knees or standing with outstretched hands and uncovered head. I do not care. I would not molest him or permit anybody else to do it. If he wants to confess to a priest, let him do it. If he wants to worship in a synagogue, let him do it. If he wants to worship as Protestants worship in the various branches of the Protestant Church or any other church, let him do it. I would not interfere with the Catholic's mode of worship, but nobody can truthfully say that that is the Roman Catholic attitude toward other religious denominations.

It has been their plan, in every government where the Catholics got control to destroy every other religion. Wherever they have had the power, they have put every other religion out of commission. Wherever they have had the power to do it, they have trampled other religions under foot, and they have set up the Catholic religion by the power of the sword. When strong enough to do so, they have declared it to be the only religion, to the exclusion of all other religions. Nobody can deny that. They have done that in Mexico. They have done it in Spain. They have done it right recently in Italy and in various countries of the world. Yes, over in Italy recently they had a "Roman Concordat," or agreement entered into between the Pope, Pius XI, and Mussolini; and oh! what has happened in Italy? The liberty that Garibaldi and his brave followers achieved for Italy 60 years ago all vanished in a single night. The "Roman Concordat" sounded the death knell of both civil and religious liberty in Italy. Free speech perished in Italy. Free press died in Italy. Peaceful assembly is denied in Italy. Religious freedom has been murdered in Italy. The union of church and state has again lifted its monstrous head in Italy, and the Pope is no longer in disguise as a spiritual ruler, but he is now a temporal monarch or Catholic king. Nobody can deny that. And the hand of his Roman kingly power reaches into every government on the earth where there are Roman Catholics, and Premier Herriot of France says that the Pope is forming Catholic political parties wherever there are Roman Catholics. We found out that there was a Roman Catholic party within the Democratic Party in 1916, when the Roman Catholic group in the United States tried to beat Wilson because he would not go to war for the Catholic Church in Mexico.

Senators, I reminded you, when I led the fight in the Senate defeating the Roman Catholic program for war with Mexico in 1927, that the Pope gave out a statement September 10, 1924, during the presidential campaign, after Alfred Smith had been defeated in the Democratic convention and the Catholics were supporting Coolidge, saying that it was not only his right but his duty to advise Catholics how to vote. I deny that that is a part of his spiritual prerogative, and I deny that any foreign Pope has the right to tell any American citizen how to vote.

You will recall that I showed you here in the Senate the figures, the actual vote, showing how Tammany traded off John Davis, Democratic candidate for President, in a deal to beat Roosevelt for Governor of New York with Al Smith, and how Tammany supported Coolidge and helped to carry New York for him. I showed you that the Catholic program was to defeat the Democratic candidate for President and leave the way clear for a Roman Catholic candidate in 1928. In other words, the Protestant candidate should be defeated so as to leave the field clear for a Roman Catholic in 1928. Because if Davis had been elected in 1924 he would have been indorsed by the party in 1928 and that would have prevented the having of what the Catholic leaders had planned and expected—a Roman Catholic President when the "concordat" was signed by the Pope and his man "Friday," Mussolini, in the early part of 1929, and when the prearranged Catholic rebellion should break out in Mexico. But the American people determined that that should not happen.

Mr. President, I hold that no foreign head, whether he is a pope or a king, has the right to tell citizens of my country how to vote. As an American Senator, I challenge their right to meddle with the governmental affairs of our country. Let them attend to their own business, and confine their political activities to their own country and stay out of our politics as a Roman Catholic political machine.

The Roman Catholic interference in the case in the State of Rhode Island where American citizens of the Roman Catholic faith were denied their rights as American citizens—that was not "religious worship." The confiscation of the newspaper property of an American citizen by an edict in Rome, Italy, was not in any sense a matter of religious worship. What they did over in Rome—in a foreign country—was a matter of injustice to an American citizen and editor of a newspaper who belonged to the Catholic Church in Rhode Island, and when I plead for his American rights I speak for the rights of Americans everywhere and for the good of my country generally. I do not propose that these foreign influences shall control or in any way intimidate any group of citizens in the United States. We might just as well settle that question now. Why, I heard Senators say that the Pope's statement the other day about free speech—opposing it—wanting to suppress it—was one of the most outrageous things that had occurred over there. He wrote a letter attacking Mussolini's speech, calling it heretical. Well, you know what they think of a heretic. If you are not a Catholic they hold that you are a heretic; and some of them believe—I do not know whether the enlightened lay members believe that or not—that there is not any harm in killing a heretic; and they also teach that if a Catholic kills a heretic and a priest forgives him, he is all right, free of sin and crime and on his road to heaven.

Think of such a doctrine as that! Think of any church holding such a view! I would ridicule it just as quickly if it were the Protestant Church or the Jewish Church that taught such a ridiculous and dangerous doctrine. The idea of any church teaching anybody that there is no harm in killing any human being—it makes no difference what church he belongs to—and that a priest holds authority from God Almighty to forgive him, is utterly ridiculous and false. No Roman priest holds any such power. I condemn any such heresy as that. They have no right to teach such a doctrine.

The idea of a priest telling some Catholic who has killed a public man, "I absolve you. No crime attaches to you. Your sins are forgiven." "Thou shalt not kill," our Creator said, and yet this contrary and dangerous Catholic doctrine has caused men to be murdered through the centuries that lie behind us. It struck down President Obregon in Mexico, and a Catholic priest dipped his handkerchief in the blood of the red-handed Catholic assassin who struck down Obregon, who led with the brave Calles in giving liberty to Rome-cursed Mexico. For 400 years she had suffered under the curse of Roman rule. For 400 years Mexicans had groped in the darkness. For 400 years their substance had been stripped from them by the priests. They were a priest-ridden people. The priests feasted and fattened upon their substance, and finally Obregon and Calles led the way, and gave liberty to Mexico.

They murdered Obregon, and the assassin said that he was inspired to his deed by Catholic priests and nuns, and now they have sent some of them to the penitentiary, since they executed the assassin, and their pictures are being paraded in the United States for the purpose of arousing sympathy for those who were guilty of the "intellectual" murder of Obregon.

Do you know what they mean by that? That is the Jesuit part of it—putting thoughts in the mind. They made suggestions to the boy to murder Obregon, and kept feeding that thought in his mind—that it was his duty to murder him; that if he did murder him, he would be doing the will of Christ and the priest would absolve him, and he would go straight to heaven. They convicted those who played the part that the Jesuits in Washington play. We have an organization of them here. They are on the job constantly. I do not know whether they have worked on any of your heads or not, Senators. They may have. They claim that they can influence you; they can put thoughts in your mind; they can sway you when you are a little doubtful and make you drop over on the Pope's side on questions involved in the Catholic program. I do not know whether they can or not, but that boy admitted that priests and nuns suggested that it would be doing the service of God to kill Obregon, this brave warrior and great Mexican patriot, and they struck him down.

When I hear a man's speech, if I do not agree with him I want to answer him. But when certain Catholics hear your speech and do not agree with it they want to murder you and put you out of the way.

I was looking just this morning at the bust of McKinley in the President's room while I was there talking to a newspaper man. He was the first President I ever saw. I was on a committee of the legislature of my State designated to call on him in Atlanta when he came to speak at the peace jubilee in 1899. He had the kindliest face; he was an able, courteous, magnificent man, and a great American. They murdered him because they did not like his position on the so-called friar lands of the Philippine Islands. He could neither be persuaded nor intimidated by the Catholics. You Senators remember that. So the noble McKinley perished at the hands of a Catholic.

My friends, the day will have to come in the United States when Catholics have a public man murdered when there must be an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, and a life for a life. I am in favor of that. They have no right to kill a Protestant Senator or a Protestant public man or any other public man because they do not like what he says and can not answer his arguments. I challenge them to answer my arguments. I demand that they quit their miserable and criminal scheming to do me bodily harm for daring to warn my country of the Roman Catholic dangers that threaten it. They do not frighten me by that. I do not know what may happen to me, but I shall continue to do my duty and to serve my country to the very best of my ability. They have no business planning the death of public men in America because such public men have sense enough and courage enough to see and expose Catholic dangers just as they would any other dangers. They have no business writing letters to public men, annoying them and threatening them because they say things that the Catholics do not want them to say. I have had three such letters within the last two weeks. One of them was read to you here from the clerk's desk. I had another one saying that they planned to assassinate me not later than the 10th of June. The time is drawing near.

Mr. President, I am going to speak at Sterling, Conn., next Sunday afternoon, to the United Protestant Churches on "The Mission of America, or the Blessings of Civil and Religious Liberty in the United States." I have the right as an American Senator to speak, to go where I please to speak, undisturbed by Roman Catholic or anybody else, and without asking permission from the Roman hierarchy in the United States. I do not ask permission to speak of a Catholic priest. I do not ask the permission of the Pope. I ask the permission of none of them. This is not Spain or Italy, nor is it yet a Catholic country. This, thank God, is America, and every American worthy of the name is willing to endure dangers, to fight, and, if need be, to die to keep this American Government true to the purpose of its creation. I would not disturb Catholic discussions anywhere. Let them speak where they please and discuss what they please; and I want them to know that they can not frighten or intimidate me. That is what they want to do. Senators, if you have not the courage to fight them now when you know that they are doing the things here that brought the downfall of governments in other countries, the day will come, I fear, when no Senator will dare make a speech in opposition to the Catholic program in the United States. If he is threatened by this group, he will be afraid, and those are the tactics they have employed to accomplish their purpose through the centuries. They have murdered enough public men, as you who are familiar with their history know, to prove that they have executed their threats against those who have interfered with the Catholic program and purpose.

I am going to repeat in part what I have said here before—if anything should happen to me, I want what I have written and left behind me carried out. It may startle some of you, but I want it carried out for the reasons that I have given. If there are enough red-blooded men in America who love their country and love American ideals and institutions well enough to rise up and put down such anarchy and assassination, let those who institute the assassination pay the penalty with their lives. I shall expect them to do that.

Just think of the conditions that we have in America, a country a little more than a century and a half old, the greatest Government in all the world menaced this early in its history by a foreign group with priests whose names you can hardly pronounce! One of them shot and killed an American girl the other day. And you have not seen any condemnation of him in any big American daily. But if he had been a Protestant preacher or a Jewish rabbi a different story would have been told.

Most of their priests are educated abroad; I think all of them. They do not have the American idea and the American ideal, and this foreign Roman idea is sought to be inculcated in America. They would have us conform, not to the principles of our fathers, but to the new idea of the Catholic Pope-King and help them to make America Catholic and then do the bidding of the Pope. If you do that you are all right with them. They will see that you get favorable publicity in the newspapers controlled by Catholics, and many of them are; and they will have you praised as a great man, and they will vote for you because you are helping them—it may be ignorantly—against your own country. But the minute you show that you are an American, wide awake to the dangers involved in the Catholic desire and the Catholic program and purpose to change the American form of government to the Catholic form of government, and show intelligence enough and American courage enough to oppose it, they attack you as they have me, with every instrumentality at their command.

If you oppose them and delay or defeat their plan and purpose, they seek to injure you in every way possible and, above all things, to drive you from the position in which you preferred to serve your country rather than betray it.

But, Mr. President, many of their queer antics are amusing. I was on the elevator with two Catholic priests at the Congress Hall Hotel not long ago, and what happened was amusing. Just us three on the elevator. One of them evidently knew me. When I got on, one of them nudged the other one and nodded his head to him, letting him know who I was, and that particular priest started to "cross" himself with his forefinger to relieve himself from the contamination and curse that might come on him from such close contact with a heretic. [Laughter.] When he lifted his finger across his chest, I looked straight at him, and he dropped his hand and looked off innocently. I interfered with his hoodoo gyrations. [Laughter.] He did not get to go through with it.

Last Sunday I spoke out at the Confederate Monument in Arlington, at the Confederate memorial service. A little band of old and feeble Confederate veterans who followed Lee and Jackson marched upon the platform where I spoke. Six weeks or two months ago they had been to my office to request me to deliver that address. I accepted the invitation and went out and spoke at that memorial service. There was a large crowd, the largest, the commander told me, that they had had in 25 years. The old veterans were kind in what they said to me about my speech, and I was happy to have them approve what I had said. But, Mr. President, I did not know until the next morning, when I read the Washington Post, that some Catholic women of Washington had tried to get the veterans and Daughters of the Confederacy to withdraw the invitation to have me speak on that occasion. What do you think of that, Senators? Oh, yes; they objected, but the Confederate women and the Confederate soldiers paid no attention to it. It was not even brought to my attention. I did not know until the story was written and printed that these two Catholic women tried to have "Senator HEFLIN'S name withdrawn as orator of the day."

I attended the exercises out at Arlington on Mother's Day a year ago and I sat in the audience and heard them speaking about the resolution creating Mother's Day, passed in 1914. I was the author of that resolution. I kept listening, thinking they would say something about who introduced the resolution and secured its passage, but they never mentioned my name. They told about President Wilson signing it and about it becoming the law and how the flags were displayed in honor of the mothers of America, but they never once referred to me. After it was all over, talking with some friends about it, I related the incident and found that a Catholic woman had asked them not to mention "Senator HEFLIN'S name" in connection with the Mother's Day service. And out of respect for the wishes of Roman Catholics they did not mention my name.

Where are we; in America or in the Vatican City of Rome? Under what rulership do we live; in a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, or in a Roman Catholic oligarchy, with a Roman Catholic king?

Who is going to rule this country? Who is going to be the master of the destiny of this Nation? Will it be a Pope in Rome or will it be the stalwart, patriotic men and women of America? These are questions that are worth considering—vital questions that concern us as Americans.

In regard to my speech up at Brockton, Mass.—oh, the letters I am getting about the Brockton resolution you Senators defeated here. They would make interesting reading for a lot of Senators, but you have suffered enough in this world already on account of your vote without my reading any of them to you now. There is one master of the Knights of Columbus, one Massicotte—M-a-s-s-i-c-o-t-t-e—whatever it is. This paper says, "Massicotte hits HEFLIN." He made a speech to the Holy Name Society. Among other things he said:

It is time, gentlemen, that we should assert ourselves; belittle and quash anything in the line of the words said by a man like HEFLIN.

What does that mean? Why, to stop, put down, suppress, put an end to, and prevent speeches being made by a man like HEFLIN? This is a land of liberty and free speech. We have a right to speak what we think we ought to say, every man, whether he is a Catholic, Protestant, or Jew. I am going to repeat for their benefit, if they start to using force to destroy these free institutions in America the day will come speedily when they will wish they had not done so. Try to put it up to the Protestant American that he can not speak unless the Roman Catholics give him permission to speak and see how long they will last. I resent and I repudiate their un-American activities in our country.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a Roman Catholic paper called the Messenger. It is published at Bishop's House, 222 South Third Street, Belleville, Ill. The editor of this paper is a Roman Catholic priest, Edward Dalmus—"damn us," probably. He is the editor. S. F. Lindenberger is the managing editor. Joseph N. Buechler is the publisher. All Roman Catholics. This villainous Roman Catholic sheet carries an article or editorial giving the story of a Catholic attack upon me. They were bold and brazen enough to mail a copy to me Friday, May 10, 1929.

The work of a certain hireling in the United States Senate—

Referring to me. Are we going to permit the use of the mails to these villainous sheets of Roman Catholics that lie about and slander the public men of this Nation, charging a Senator with being hired to speak for his country against the supremacy of Roman Catholicism, which, if permitted to go on unchecked, as we have seen it operate, means the overthrow of free government in America? Among other things it says:

Why do they not lock him [HEFLIN] up? The editor. There is a reason in Senator HEFLIN'S madness.

I should say there is a reason for his alertness and indignation. The Roman Catholics hold that the will of the Pope is the supreme law of all lands. I challenge any Senator to deny that. They hold that the supreme duty of all Catholics is to do the will of the Pope. I challenge any Senator to deny that. They hold that the government has no right to permit the citizen to have the religion of his or her choice. I challenge any Senator to deny that.

Pope Leo XIII—and this is the doctrine of the whole Catholic Church—said it was the duty of all Catholics "to have the constitutions of their states conform to the doctrine of the Catholic Church." I challenge any Senator to deny that.

It is their purpose and plan—Doctor Ryan admits it, and he is an appointee of the Pope of Rome here in the Catholic University of America, a Catholic priest—to make America Catholic. I challenge any Senator to deny that.

I assert that wherever they have been able to make a country Catholic they have crucified other religions, they have destroyed religious freedom, free speech, free press, peaceful assembly, and the public-school system. They have destroyed civil and religious liberty, and I challenge any Senator to deny that.

The facts of history bear me out in these statements. Nobody here has dared to dispute them. Nobody can. Then, Mr. President, I submit that it is high time that every real American in the Senate and in the House was crying out against the present persistent and dangerous program of the Roman Catholics in the United States. Choose ye this day whom you will serve.

This same Catholic paper says:

It is the waste of valuable energy to fly into a temper whenever you read about another of his [HEFLIN'S] attacks on the Catholic Church. Why not give quiet thought to the whole affair?

That, Mr. President, is what I want them to do. If the authorities in that church—I mean the Pope and his college of cardinals—will announce that they are not opposed to "free speech"; that they will never meddle with it any more; that they are not opposed to "free press" and will not interfere with it any more; that they are not opposed to "peaceful assembly" and will not interfere with that any more; that they are not opposed to the "public-school system"; that they are not opposed to "religious freedom"; that they are not opposed to the "separation of church and state," and will in no way interfere with them any more, I promise them that I will have no further quarrel with them. But they will not do that. The Roman program is fixed. It is in their canon laws, centuries old. They say they are going to "make America Catholic." I do not want them to make America Catholic. Have they a right to try to make America Catholic and I no right to try to keep them from "making America Catholic"? That is the logic of their position.

Let me read again from this same Catholic statement:

The editor—

This is the Catholic priest talking—

The editor: The only motive it can be is a motive inspired by politics. Mr. HEFLIN, with 8 or 9 of the 13 who voted with him, are seeking reelection next year.

That is not so. There are more of them who voted with me who are not running for office next year than those who are; but suppose there were more of them, their voting with me would commend them to the American people who want to keep Americans on guard at the Capitol. There were 16 who voted with me. Fourteen voted outright and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] were paired on my side, making 16, and 14 of them were from the South. There were two Republicans, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], who voted to preserve free speech and peaceful assembly in the United States.

Then, again, this same Roman Catholic paper says:

Senator HEFLIN and his 13 helpers do not desire to pose as friends of Rome.

What sort of an attitude is he putting you Senators in who voted with him? Do you desire to be listed as "friends of Rome," and as "enemies of America"?

He says:

They expect to profit by their "anti-Catholic attitude."

I am sorry that there is the necessity in our country for an "anti-Catholic attitude." I have made the proposition to them to abandon their un-American tactics, to quit their program which means ruin to my country unless it is abandoned. Have not I as an American the right to do that? I am, I trust, a whole-hearted American. I am not speaking for myself alone. I am speaking for as fine and patriotic a people as ever lived on this earth, representing in part Alabama, one of the greatest States in the Union. Have I not a right to speak for the good of my State and the good of my country, to try to preserve her institutions and to give warning in time of dangers that threaten? It is the coward who sits idly by and folds his arms and refuses to speak because to speak might endanger his life physically or politically. The American people back home are learning something about what is going on here.

Again, this Catholic paper says:

All the 13 (of those who voted with him) might be happier if Senator HEFLIN were dead and buried and forgotten.

They are still thinking about my death. Oh, they would rejoice, many of them, but what an exciting time Catholic priests, bishops, cardinals, and Catholic politicians would have for a full year following my death. How many of their number who conspired to assassinate me would pay the penalty—and I approve that course.

Here is another statement in this same Catholic paper:

While he lives and talks they must be on their guard. Votes are at stake and votes rank higher than convictions for many a politician.

That is the Catholic conception of American Senators who are trying to do their duty and serve their country. Braver men never sat in the Senate than the men who voted with me on the Brockton resolution. What American citizen can vote to sustain a Senator who votes against a resolution to condemn mob interference with free speech—a resolution that condemned an attempt to do violence to an American Senator for discussing the dangers that threaten the American Government?

Here is another Roman Catholic suggestion. Roman Catholic leaders and Roman Catholic newspapers are talking about opposition to me and they demand that I be defeated for reelection to the Senate. These Roman Catholics up in Illinois and in Boston and in New York and around in Raskob's Tammany circles have all demanded that I be driven from the Senate. They say "Catholic interests demand it." All of them, multitudes of them, are conspiring against me; and then what are they going to do to me? After one of them, discussing me in this Catholic article, expressed a doubt that they could defeat me, what do they say? Listen to this and see if you attach any significance to the language used:

What if HEFLIN is reelected to the Senate?

The editor, the Roman Catholic priest, said:

Let us wait until that happens.

Wait for what? To see what disposition they would then decide to make of me. They are playing with firebrands and do not know it. I want the vigilance committee of Illinois to take the names of those three men.

I have read them into the RECORD and they will have them by day after to-morrow. I want the American vigilance committee in every State in the Union to take their names and to take in that connection this statement with all of the threats that have been made against me. In the face of the mob attack made on me at Brockton, Mass., I want to assert to you that not a single Catholic in public life or a single Catholic priest, bishop, or cardinal, or a single Catholic anywhere has ever offered one word of protest or criticism against their attacks upon me or against their threats against my life, or against any other of the un-American activities of which they have been guilty. If that does not place the responsibility upon the whole Catholic group, I am unable to make myself understood.

This Catholic editor says again, and now he is talking politics:

The Democratic Party might be given an apparently anti-Catholic character if men like Smith and Raskob could be compelled by anti-Catholic agitation to abandon their present leading position in the party.

Do you get that, Senators? My Southern brethren, I want you especially to hear that.

Another Catholic:

Do you mean to say that big and honorable men like Raskob and Smith should step aside in order to pacify HEFLIN, SIMMONS and company?

The editor-priest comes in again:

Of course not, but that seems to be the purpose of the continuance of the anti-Catholic agitation by anti-Smith Democrats.

It goes deeper than that. The American people attended to that last November. Alfred E. Smith was overwhelmingly defeated by them at the polls. They have eliminated him so far as that phase of it goes and now they say that I am seeking to get rid of the leadership of Smith and Raskob for the good of the Democratic Party and they are right about that. Such leadership muzzles and stifles the Democratic Party. It hampers and holds it back in the work it was intended to do in America.

Senators, I love my party. I love its long and glorious record. It has a record for devotion to duty and love of principle as pure as light and stainless as a star. There is not a scandal in all its national history, not one. While I love my party, I put my country first. I would not serve my party to the hurt and injury of my country. I want my country preserved, and then my party will live. But if my country dies, my party is dead and all that I hold dear is dead. This is not a partisan political battle. It is a battle for the preservation of American ideals and institutions, for the liberty of the citizen and the freedom of the press. We are going to preserve those things at any cost in America.

Again this Catholic statement says:

They wish to impress upon the Democratic Party that it will be impossible to reunite the party and make the South solidly Democratic again as long as Catholic men like Raskob and Smith are the highest leaders in the organization. "Out with Smith and Raskob or you will never restore the solid South." The vote of 12 southern Senators in favor of the Heflin resolution had such a ring in it.

There were 15 southern Senators who voted for my resolution.

I am going to assert something now, Mr. President, and I challenge any one to dispute the accuracy of my statement. There is not a Senator in this body from the South who will stand up here now and let the people of the South know this far in advance that he is for Governor Smith for President in 1932. There is not one of them who will do it. There is not a Senator here from the South who will rise in this body and say that he wants Raskob to remain at the head of the Democratic National Committee, that he believes it good for the Democratic Party, that he believes the South can be reunited under his Tammany leadership. There is not one here who will do it. Then what are we going to do to free our party of this dangerous and deadly leadership? We are tied at present to this body of political death. We are going to break the chains that bind us and rid the Democratic Party of the things that hamper and hinder it. The things that produce discord, deep dissension, and disintegration.

Listen to what this editor-priest says about the Ku-Klux Klan. They hate and fear the klan more than they do any other Protestant order in America. He is talking now about the klan moving its headquarters from Washington to Atlanta:

Washington is too expensive and it is becoming too risky for politicians to be greeted or nodded at by wizards and kleagles.

This Catholic priest seems to have the idea that Protestant Senators are afraid for a Roman Catholic to see them speaking to a member of the Ku-Klux Klan about the Capitol. I would speak to a patriotic member of the Ku-Klux Klan just as quickly as I would speak to any other patriotic American. I believe in many of the principles that order stands for. As I have said before, my father was the head of the klan in Alabama in reconstruction days, and knowing the good work done by that order then, I have always had an affectionate regard for the klan. My father and others like him saved the civilization of the white man in the South through the service of the Ku-Klux Klan. They walked the highways in the nighttime with their rifles guarding the widows and daughters of Confederate soldiers dead in battle against negroes filled with lust and carnality and drunk on their new-found freedom. The Ku-Klux Klan has made mistakes, and it has profited by them. And the Ku-Klux Klan has done a great deal of good. It rendered a great service to America in the last campaign. There were 1,700,000 of them who stood last fall in the campaign against Romanism, Tammanyism, wetism, and social equalityism, all typified in Alfred Smith and John J. Raskob.

Mr. President, after the election and Smith was defeated the Tammanyites announced immediately that there was a deficit of $1,500,000. They thought that all out after they heard from the returns. They have no deficit and had none, but when the news came in that Smith was overwhelmingly defeated they decided to say there was a deficit. They said Smith carried only eight States—and my State was listed in that number—but I do not think that he carried my State. I had some interesting information on the subject to-day. There were, I am reliably informed, more than 25,000 Hoover ballots that the managers in various places did not think were properly marked, but under section 475 of our code they were. Those ballots were laid aside and never counted. The counting of those ballots would have given Hoover the State by 20,000 majority; so Smith carried seven States in all. But when the news came in that he was defeated they said, "Now the cry will go up from southern and western Democrats to get rid of Raskob, and the best way to meet that is to say we have a deficit of a million and a half dollars." So they agreed on the story and figure of this beautiful piece of Tammany fiction. They said, "If we tell them we have a deficit of a million and a half dollars, then they will say "Let Raskob alone until he pays it off and then we will get rid of him."

So they held "Rasky" in his place because of a fictitious million and a half dollars deficit. They passed the word around: "Say nothing about Raskob until he pays off the deficit." That was said to me in the cloakroom. I said, "Raskob has got to go; he must give up the chairmanship of the national Democratic executive committee." They said, "Sh—sh. Do not bother him yet; let him pay off the deficit." I said, "There is no deficit; that is a piece of Tammany deception employed to keep Raskob in." Then they brought Alfred Smith out to say a word about the deficit. He got such a drubbing that he did not want to move; but finally the Roman Catholic leaders went to him and said, no doubt, "What is the greatest political influence in the United States?" "The Republican Party." "What is the next greatest political influence in the United States?" "The Democratic Party." "Are you, a Roman Catholic, going to give up the leadership and control. And is Raskob going to give up the leadership and control of that great political machine? Have we ever had before such a plausible national vehicle to carry forward in disguise Catholic propaganda in the United States? Have we ever had a vehicle on which we could travel so rapidly and in so many different directions as we could while using the Democratic Party behind a Catholic candidate and directing its policies; forget it; the idea of your saying you will not run in 1932 and of the talk of Raskob getting off of the Democratic national committee a little later on."

They said: "Stop all such talk and stay in control." Their continued leadership and control is seriously injuring the Democratic Party.

The Democrats of the South are not going to work under the leadership of Raskob; the Democrats of the West are not going to work under the leadership of Raskob. Go read the returns from the West and see how Democrats by the thousands and tens of thousands voted for Hoover. Go read the returns from the South, the Gibraltar of Democracy, the rock-ribbed Democratic section, which has stood there through the years that have gone, carrying the banner when principle and right and fine leadership were at stake, and see how the South revolted this time. Many of the best Democrats—men and women of the South—refused to support Smith. Many of the best Democrats did support him; they said, many of them, they had better go on and be regular, but others, and I was one of them, said it was best for the party and for the country that he and what he stood for should be defeated.

Nobody can question my Democracy. I have espoused the cause of the party in my State when some of the little whippersnapper critics of mine were in their swaddling clothes.

I battled for white supremacy in Alabama and in other Southern States when many of the now apparently courageous politicians tucked their tails and sought the tall timber. I have been a party man, and I am a party man to-day; but the Democratic Party is not for Smith; the Democratic Party is not for Raskob. I challenge any southern Senator to rise here and say that Smith represents the Democracy of the South or that Raskob represents the Democracy of the South. They will not do it. Then the correctness of my position is admitted.

What has the Democratic Party got tied to it now? It has got Tammany tied around its neck. What is the record and the history of Tammany? Hold your nose and read it. Go ask Grover Cleveland, the stalwart old Democrat of New York. He said, "It is the most corrupt political organization in the United States." Call Woodrow Wilson and ask him to give his judgment upon Tammany. He said, "It is the most corrupt political machine on earth." Go ask William Jennings Bryan, who did more to purify politics than any single force in America for 50 years; ask his opinion of Tammany, and he answers, "It is the hotbed and home of graft and political corruption of every kind." And yet in the face of Tammany's unclean and criminal record Tammany is at the head of and has its hand on the throat of the great Democratic Party. Tammany is at the head of affairs with Raskob, who is a Republican to-day. He is now a member of the Union League Club of Philadelphia, unless he has resigned within the last few weeks; and yet he is at the head of the Democratic Party in the Nation. My God, where are the statesmen of the old days who answered to the name of Democrat? Oh, think of it, you Democrats from the South! Raskob, the Roman Tammanyite, at the head of our party. He does not speak for, he can not speak for, the white hosts of the Democratic South who have preserved the ark of the Democratic covenant through all the years that are behind us.

Mr. President, I have seen the time when the Republicans swept the East like a cyclone and not a Democratic governor was left in that section; I have seen the time when the Republicans swept the North and not a Democratic governor was left in that section; I have seen the time, during my public service, when the Republicans swept the West and no Democratic governor was left in that section; but the South, God bless her, stood with head erect and light upon her face, with a record for clean politics and honest public service unparalleled in the history of the country. Is the South to stand by her old standards of honesty—of high ideals and lofty principles—or is she to surrender them and become the miserable political agent of corrupt and criminal Tammany? Where is the South to turn to-day? The section that produced Washington and Jefferson, Madison and Monroe and Lee, Jackson, and Wilson and the long line of illustrious men must now turn for leadership to Raskob, who would not know a governmental policy or a Democratic principle from a mouse-colored mule. [Laughter.] All hail! The Roman-Raskobian Tammanyite is the stalwart leader of our party now, and he comes out with the honors of Tammany thick upon him, where graft and corruption constitute the order of the day.

Oh, Mr. President, what is Tammany doing to the South? Tammany was against the South when the antilynching bill was before Congress. Oh, yes; and the other day when in the House some bewhiskered gentleman, a man from Massachusetts with a bosom full of beard, offered an amendment to the apportionment census bill to cut down the South's representation; where was Tammany then? Oh, Senators from the South, where, under the Raskob régime, was Tammany then, when the rights of the South were at stake?

When the South, which had purified the ballot, driven corruption from the polls, established an educational qualification for voters and a poll-tax plan—the Supreme Court having decided that the constitutions of Southern States were right and sound—when the South, which had no apology to make but stood up facing the world, was sought to be humiliated by a negro proposition which was thrust in her face by a northern Republican representative of Roman Catholic Massachusetts, how did Tammany vote? Tammany walked over to the side of those who would punish the South, those who would cripple and humiliate her, those who would deprive her of her fair representation in the Congress. Tammany voted to a man against the South. Then talk to me about that miserable and motley bunch leading the South! It will never be the judgment of the self-respecting and patriotic Democrats of the South.

I charged in the Senate last spring before Governor Smith was nominated that he and his Tammany crowd were for social equality. I quoted the New York World, his warm supporter, saying that Governor Smith was for social equality. I asserted on the floor of the Senate that Governor Smith's record and affiliations showed him to be in favor of mixed schools for white and negro children; that Catholic parochial schools had white children and negro children side by side in the same schoolroom. I asserted on the information that I have that Governor Smith favored marriage between whites and negroes and that he favored whites and negroes worshiping together in the same church. And I charged in the Senate that Governor Smith's church—the Catholic Church—does that very thing to-day and that the doctrine of that church is the same in every State in the Union.

I also charged that Governor Smith permitted in the city of New York, while governor, the operation of "dance halls" where negro men danced with women of white skins, and that while Governor of New York he permitted the marriage of negroes, and helped to pass a bill in the legislature when he was a member of that body to compel all hotels and restaurants to admit on terms of equality whites and negroes alike. I challenged him on the floor of the Senate to deny the charges that I made there, but he made no denial.

I challenged him on the hustings in my State to deny these charges, but, knowing that my charges were true, he made no denial then. And I now most respectfully request him to make denial of any one or all of them. He will not deny them. He can not deny them.

Those of you who believe that the southern men and women of the Democratic faith will surrender their self-respect, their convictions, and their principles to the Roman-Tammany leadership are very much mistaken.

Now, there is being planned a dinner to be given in Washington next Monday night to boost Raskob and this little fellow, Shouse, a Tammany pet from Kansas. Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet! Shouse is another Tammanyite in disguise. He has been in their environment so long that he can almost talk like they can, and he has got to the point where he thinks as they do. Little Mr. Shouse! And he has come down here to take charge of the Raskob régime at Washington. I wonder if he has established connections as yet with the National Catholic Welfare Council. Joe Tumulty is the secretary of his association, I believe, and next Monday night they are to have a feast to boost Raskob and try to continue him as chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Of course, they do not say that is what the dinner is for; they say that it is to honor Mr. Shouse. Well, I should like to know the whys and wherefores of that. I have not discovered anything yet in his performance that warrants Democrats in assembling to honor him. What is it all about?

Mr. Shouse is not big enough and broad enough from any standpoint to lead the Democratic Party. We have got to have a new deal; we are going to have a new deal. Mr. Raskob must go; he must get off the Democratic National Committee. Alfred Smith had no right to select him. He is a Republican; he voted at the preceding election for the Republican ticket, and was a member of the Union League Club of Philadelphia at the time he became chairman of the Democratic National Committee. He is now a member of that Republican club unless, as I have said, he has recently resigned, because early last fall when the campaign was in progress I was in Philadelphia, and I had a gentleman to call up the Union League Club from my room and ask them to give him Raskob's address. He did so. I said, "Now ask, but do not let them know who you are, if Raskob is still a member of the Republican Union League Club." The question was asked, and the reply was, "Yes; he is still a member." So Raskob still belongs to that Republican club; and yet he is at the head of the Democratic group, leader of the great democracy of the South and of the West and of the Nation. Think of the absurdity of such a thing.

Mr. President, the salvation of this country depends upon an alliance between the Democratic South and the Republican West; those two sections must get together. In 1916 Wilson got them together, and we elected a President, with only two candidates in the field. It shows that the South and the West can control if they will get together.

I have been in the western section of the United States and I never received a warmer welcome anywhere than amongst the western people. The Democrats of the West did not want Smith, and they did not all vote for him, though, of course, some of them did so and they were mighty good Democrats. In the South it was the same way. The cotton-growing South and the grain-growing West, I repeat, must get together.

What has happened to the debenture plan? The House conferees with a little encouragement from certain Senate conferees, have knocked it into a cocked hat; and they did not even let the House vote on it. What sort of a Congress have we got in the United States now? When one body votes to adopt the debenture plan, which would assure the farmers a good price for their wheat and cotton beyond all question, and the measure is taken over to the House; a handful of Members stand before the door and will not let the debenture plan come in and be voted on; and the whole House, representing all the States of the Union, is denied the right to vote at all on the debenture proposition that the Senate put in the bill. Then the conference committee of the Senate backs off and comes into the Senate with the debenture plan stricken from the bill without the House ever having a chance to vote on it.

It is an insult to the Senate; a direct slap at every Senator here who voted on it to permit such an outrageous thing to happen over in the House of Representatives. The Members of the House had a right to vote on it, and their people back home had a right to have them vote on it; but they have not been permitted to exercise that right. New York and Tammany and the other big Eastern interests have done this dastardly thing.

Now, where is our hope? It is in uniting the South and the West. Senators, I believe you had better keep your eye on that combination in 1932. It looks to me as though if you permit the East to kill farm relief and you go away from here with nothing done, the farmers of the West are going to be so disgusted that they will revolt and join with the Democratic South and elect a President.

Mr. President, a word more about the South and the West. We have seen enough here, Senators, those of us who have been here a long time, to know that if you put through a bill for the benefit of agriculture that has teeth in it, before the East get through with it they will extract practically all those teeth and they will leave you with a toothless shell of a thing. It looks like we have reached the point where the special interests, the predatory interests of the country, are literally controlling the Government. They are shaping its policies. They are having done just what they want done. That must be stopped. This Government must be restored to the rule of the people.

It must be made to do what the people want done, and not be a mere rubber stamp in the hands of the sinister interests of this Nation who are using the Government to concentrate the wealth of the Nation in the hands of a few, and at the same time robbing the masses of the people of a fair share of this world's goods. Centralization of power and the concentration of wealth have figured in the downfall of every nation that has perished, and it is time that we were giving attention to these dangers that threaten free government in America.

But some Senators seem to be so much tied up with certain big interests that they are of little value to the great mass of the people when their American rights and interests are assailed. So many Senators and Members rely on certain special interests to help them along in their political ambitions. That ought not to be. No Senator ought to be the enemy of a big corporation. He ought to be the friend of it, if it is a legitimate concern; but he ought not to be the tool of it and the agent of it. He ought to be the friend of every concern, whether it be big or little, and he ought to be big enough to do his duty and be fair to all concerned. He should do justice by the big concern and the little concern. The true statesman is the man who will serve his country at all hazards, and who will dare to defend the weak against the strong and call down a big interest just as he would a little interest.

Before I close I want to mention another one of Tammany's attacks upon the South. Mr. President, I was astounded at this last performance of the Tammany crowd. The Washington Post of this morning says, in reference to the proceedings of the House yesterday:

> Another proposal to have all "aliens" in the United States registered was struck out of the measure.

How shocking was that performance. They would not permit us to eliminate aliens from the basis of population for membership in the House and they would not even let us make a list of them to find out who they are, where they are, and how many of them are now in the United States. Seven millions of aliens; men who do not owe allegiance to this country; hundreds of thousands of them smuggled into our country; men who have not sworn allegiance to the flag; men who have never been naturalized; men who are here eating up the substance that American men and women should have and getting wage-paying positions that they ought to fill. They are here; they are participating in politics; they are penetrating into every nook and corner of the Nation. They are here, seven millions strong, and their influence and the Roman Tammany influence back of them is strong enough to prevent the American Congress from eliminating them from the basis for representation in Congress; and on that 7,000,000 aliens now in the United States 35 Members of this Congress sit, and these "aliens" are not even American citizens! And yet I am called intolerant and fanatical by Roman Catholics because I am demanding a fair deal and a square deal for my own country and exposing the same dangers here that have wrecked many governments in the past.

Should not I and should not you be on guard every day against evils and dangers that are present and active in the very strongholds of our American Government?

Mr. President, I want my country to remain true to the purpose of its creation. I want these aliens eliminated from the basis of representation; and, Senators, you will not be much older until they will be eliminated. If there is any one question that the American people are pretty generally agreed on, it is that aliens should not be counted for "representation" in the other branch of Congress. You have run counter to this will, and this foreign influence and this alien influence here amongst us is strong enough to paralyze the hands of Congress and the American Congress sits impotent in the face of that power. Oh, Mr. President, it is fearful!

These Fascist agents of Mussolini and these criminal aliens must be deported—driven out of our country. Now, Mr. President, I desire to include in my remarks a statement that I issued some time ago in regard to reuniting the Democrats of the South and also a statement as to who it was that first suggested that I be read out of the Democratic Party. I want the history of this whole movement to be in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Senator HEFLIN is in favor of Democrats getting together in Alabama. In speaking of the Democratic situation in the State to-day, he said:

"Thousands of Democrats in Alabama who voted for Governor Smith did not relish the idea of casting their votes for him for President of the United States. They voted for him reluctantly. The issues were so confused and misleading statements were so numerous during the campaign that thousands of Democrats never got the real truth of what Governor Smith's candidacy represented, or the facts regarding the reprehensible methods employed by those backing him to secure his nomination. There were thousands of Democrats in the State who felt that under all the circumstances it was better for the Democratic Party and better for the country that Governor Smith, with all the foreign and domestic 'isms' that were tied to his candidacy should be defeated.

"On the other hand, thousands of Democrats who did not want to vote for Smith decided that it was best to go ahead and vote for him and remain regular. I have never criticized them for doing what they thought they should do in the premises. I deeply regretted the unpleasant and embarrassing situation that had come upon us. There was no trouble in the Democratic household so far as State candidates and State issues were concerned. The Democrats of Alabama were united and harmonious on the ticket nominated by the party in the State. Our trouble grew out of an unfortunate, dangerous, and deplorable situation that developed in the mismanagement of the party nationally. Coercive and intimidative methods had been employed to secure the nomination of Governor Smith.

"In addition to that he bolted the platform adopted at Houston and went out of the Democratic Party and selected a Republican to be chairman of the Democratic National Committee, a thing distasteful and shocking to seven-eights of the Democrats of Alabama, and unprecedented in the history of the party. It was indeed an extraordinary and an exceedingly trying situation that confronted the Democrats of our State. We were not responsible for the great mistake made in nominating Smith at Houston.

"I voted for every Democrat on the State ticket, but in view of the vital and far-reaching issues involved and his own undemocratic conduct and the alien influences back of him, I could not conscientiously vote for Governor Smith to be President of the United States. I did not vote at all on electors for presidential candidates. At almost every place where I spoke my Democratic friends who supported Smith and my Democratic friends who supported Hoover advised me personally to refrain from voting on the presidential candidates. I had scores of letters requesting that I pursue that course. Some of those who talked to me and wrote to me had already heard a few ambitious fellows and would-be candidates for the Senate boasting that they were going to read me out of the party and prevent me from running as a Democrat to succeed myself in the Senate, and for that reason my friends in both groups wanted me to do as I did. I am not in favor of reading anybody out of the Democratic Party for failing to vote for the Roman-social equality-Raskob-Tammany outfit, and I have had letters from hundreds of Democrats who voted for Smith and as many from Democrats who voted for Hoover, saying they favor the getting together of all Democrats in Alabama as soon as possible. That should be and will be the attitude of every true Democrat in the State.

"Is it not a little strange that in all the other Southern States Democrats on both sides are arranging to get together and move on as before, but in Alabama a few fellows are trying to prevent such an arrangement? I wonder if those ambitious men could be aiming at me. My friends write me that a few political jugglers in the State who imagine that they own the Democratic Party in fee simple want to greatly reduce the party membership so they can handle it to better advantage to themselves personally. That small group is trying to influence the State Democratic executive committee to read all Democrats who opposed Smith out of the party and prevent me from running in the primary. The party must not be controlled by a little coterie of selfish, short-sighted men at Birmingham and Montgomery who would, if permitted to have their way, do permanent injury to the Democratic Party in Alabama.

"The Democrats of Texas, Virginia, Tennessee, North Carolina, Florida, and Georgia are working harmoniously in a 'get-together movement.'

"The first demand that I be read out of the Democratic Party came not from Alabama but from Roman Catholics in Massachusetts when they wired Senator ROBINSON, minority leader of the Senate, to call a caucus of Democratic Senators to read me out of the party. Did not that look like these agents of Rome felt as if they owned the Democratic Party? But three-fourths of the Democrats of the Senate let it be known that no such action as the Romanists suggested would be taken against me.

"The next demand came from the same source, when Roman Catholics from Massachusetts wired Governor Graves, of Alabama, demanding that he call the legislature together and have me read out of the Democratic Party. Governor Graves ignored the Roman request.

"Those two requests were made to have me read out of the party because I had led the fight in the Senate to defeat the Roman Catholic program to involve the United States in war with Mexico; and because I exposed the Hearst-Catholic conspiracy to destroy me politically for daring to expose and oppose the Catholic program to use the United States Army and kill American boys in a war to put the Catholic Church back in control of the Government of Mexico.

"When Congress reconvened, Roman Catholics demanded that I be denied committee assignments as a Democrat and not allowed to attend the Democratic conference, and they demanded that I be read out of the party by the Democrats of the Senate who had supported Smith, but more than two-thirds of them were outspoken in their opposition to such a course. And I have been invited to and have attended every Democratic conference and have participated in the conference deliberations just as I had done before. And when the Senate committee assignments were up for consideration at the beginning of this extra session of Congress, since the presidential election of 1928, I received the same committee assignments that I had sought and obtained when I first entered the Senate, and received one additional committee position. The two committees that I sought above all others were the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and Post Offices and Post Roads. I am also on the Civil Service Committee and the Pension Committee.

"Now the same Roman Catholic interests are demanding that I be read out of the Democratic Party in my State by the Democratic Executive Committee of Alabama. These Catholics outside of my State and in it are demanding that I be denied the right to run as a candidate to succeed myself as a Democrat in the primary in Alabama because I have exposed the dangerous activities of Roman Catholics. They act like they own the Democratic Party in every State. They have tried all sorts of approaches and schemes on the Democratic Committee of Alabama.

"Some of the whispered offers made are shocking to contemplate. I don't believe the members of the Democratic State Committee of Alabama can be reached and controlled by any such reprehensible means. I do not believe that the men selected as members of the State Democratic Executive Committee for Alabama two years ago can be intimidated or corruptly controlled to do the bidding of the social-equality Tammany grafters and wet Roman Catholic machine that hate me because I have interfered with their plan and purpose in the United States. The men and women of the South and West who know what Democratic principles are will not follow the leadership of the Roman-Tammany group. Tammany was denounced by Grover Cleveland, Woodrow Wilson, and William Jennings Bryan as the most corrupt political organization in the United States. In 1916, when Wilson denounced and repudiated Tammany, the West united with the South and elected Wilson, a Democrat, President.

"In the last presidential campaign hundreds of thousands of Democrats in the South would not support Smith. There is nothing in common between the Democrats of the South and West and the social-equality, Roman, wet, Tammany Democrats of the East. We ought to profit by the mistake that was made in turning over the party leadership to Tammany, which resulted in nominating Smith in 1928, and we ought to get rid of the Tammany millstone that hangs around the neck of the great Democratic Party. Those who love the party are ready, for the good of the party, to do whatever is necessary to bring about a reconciliation among Democrats. Those who wish to use the party for sordid purposes, to make it the tool of alien influences and Roman Catholicism in the United States, do not want the Democrats who opposed Smith to have any voice in the councils of the party. It is plain that the Roman Catholic hierarchy has determined to use the Democratic Party to carry forward the Catholic program in the United States."

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I hold in my hand—and this, perhaps, will be news to most of you Senators—a picture in a Catholic paper of Alfred E. Smith as President in 1932. This is cut from the Liberty Magazine, a Roman Catholic periodical. It is in competition with the Saturday Evening Post. They are printing a series of stories. Some fellow has drawn tremendously on his imagination—and, my God, what an imagination he has [laughter] that Alfred Smith will be President in 1932! And listen. Here is the picture: With Alfred Smith sitting over on the left with his imaginary cabinet asking some fellow questions about the "red menace." I want them to talk about the "Roman menace" for a while. Here is what it says below the picture:

President Alfred E. Smith and his Cabinet questioning Mr. Gibbons about Karakhan and the red menace. Seated at the President's left—

The wild and reckless imagination is at work again—

Seated at the President's left are Secretary of the Treasury John J. Raskob—

[Laughter.]

Now, is not that enough to jar a wagonload of tadpoles out of a stagnant pool? [Laughter.]

Secretary of the Treasury John J. Raskob; next is Attorney General Frank Comerford, and Secretary of Agriculture RUTH HANNA MCCORMICK.

Why, she is a Republican, so called, and so is Rasky; and Mrs. MCCORMICK is running for the Senate, I understand, in Illinois next year as a Republican. They must intend to bring about some coalition, somehow. Yes; Mrs. MCCORMICK is put down here as Secretary of Agriculture.

In the background are Secretaries Cuneo and Ryan—

and Postmaster General Emory Olds.

And the Smith-Roman Raskob régime is sitting on the neck of the Democratic Party planning for 1932.

What hope have we with such a dead load upon us—like the old man of the sea and Sinbad the Sailor? You have heard the story of Sinbad the Sailor, who was shipwrecked and about to starve. Wandering about on the seashore, he found an old pumpkin and some grapes hanging in purple clusters on the vines near by. He crushed them and put them in the shell of the pumpkin and made some food.

The old man of the sea inveigled Sinbad through his pleadings and great promises to take him on his shoulders and carry him across a little stream and put him down in the shade of a great tree.

Sinbad bowed his back and took the old man on. He sat astride his neck, and when Sinbad got over to the shade of the tree the old man of the sea held on and refused to get off. He held on, but Sinbad the sailor, realizing how he had been deceived and imposed upon, was determined to get rid of his burden, and with one mighty effort he threw the old man of the sea from his shoulders and walked forth a free man again.

Smith secured the nomination through deception and reprehensible practices.

Raskob sits astride the neck of the Democratic Party. The Democratic Party is now getting ready to shake him off, to get rid of her unbearable burden. Shake Raskob off and watch the Democrats of the South get together. They will come back and strike hands about a common center and sit down as friends around the campfires of the party for the good of the party of Jefferson and for the good of the whole United States.

Out with Mr. Raskob! Away with the candidacy of Governor Smith for President on the Democratic ticket in 1932. Let our party have a breathing spell. Let her get back in her ancient virile fighting form, when she stood erect and looked the world in the face and had nothing to fear, nothing to apologize for. Long live the Democracy of Jefferson!

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1) to establish a Federal farm board to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, and to place agriculture on a basis of economic equality with other industries.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 1648) to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended, and it was signed by the Vice President.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. MCNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. MCNARY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. NYE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen	Burton	Dill	Goldsborough
Ashurst	Capper	Edge	Harris
Bingham	Caraway	Fletcher	Harrison
Blease	Connally	Frazier	Hatfield
Borah	Copeland	George	Hawes
Bratton	Couzens	Glass	Hebert
Brookhart	Cutting	Glenn	Heflin
Broussard	Deneen	Goff	Howell
Johnson	Oddie	Smith	Wagner
Jones	Overman	Steck	Walcott
King	Phipps	Swanson	Walsh, Mass.
McKellar	Pittman	Thomas, Idaho	Warren
McNary	Reed	Thomas, Okla.	Waterman
Metcalf	Robinson, Ark.	Townsend	Watson
Moses	Sackett	Trammell	Wheeler
Norbeck	Schall	Tydings
Norris	Sheppard	Tyson
Nye	Shortridge	Vandenberg

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF THE IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield further?

Mr. MCNARY. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I assume that the Senator rises to have laid before the Senate the conference report on the farm relief bill. I wish he would withhold his motion just long enough to have it ascertained whether or not it is possible at this time to agree upon an hour on which to vote upon the unfinished business now before the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. No, Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I direct my inquiry to the Senator from Pennsylvania as to whether he thinks we might agree upon an hour within the next few days at which time we would take a vote upon the resolution now the unfinished business.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, on Wednesday last I went to the Senator from North Dakota saying that I thought it would best suit the convenience of Senators if we might have an agreement for a time to vote, but at that time he did not see his way clear to join with me in reaching such an agreement. To suggest it now, when it is obvious that we are going into a considerable debate on the conference report on the farm bill, would be tantamount to an agreement to choke off all debate on the unfinished business.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. For that reason I would not be willing to agree at this time to such an arrangement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the Senator. By way of reassurance to the Senator from North Dakota, the Chair will state that if the motion to be made by the Senator from Oregon shall prevail, it will not interfere with the status of the unfinished business.

Mr. NYE. I recognize that, Mr. President, but does the Senator from Pennsylvania mean to say that a proposal was made to me for a given hour to vote upon Senate Resolution 37?

Mr. REED. No; not at all. I asked the Senator on Wednesday if we could not agree to fix some time for a vote on the unfinished business, and he said that he was not prepared to agree in reply to my request.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, my recollection does not carry me back to an understanding of that sort at all.

Mr. REED. There was no understanding.

Mr. NYE. I would have been glad to enter into an agreement as to a time to vote. I wonder if we can not accomplish such an agreement at this time.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; not when we are faced with a debate on two conference reports.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I understand from those who have the more important conference report in hand that there will be no endeavor on their part to press for its early consideration, if we can indicate the possibility of our getting a vote upon the unfinished business within the next day or two.

Mr. REED. I am not so advised. I understand that both these conference reports will be pressed as rapidly as possible to a conclusion, and until they are disposed of I do not care to make any such agreement.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. MCNARY. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I was under the impression that the Senator from Pennsylvania, when the debate opened on the national-origins question about a week ago—I do not recall the date—in answer to an inquiry, I think, from the Senator from North Dakota, as to the time which would probably be consumed, stated that he thought it would take about two days. Senate Resolution 37 has been before the Senate some time longer than that.

Mr. REED. That is true, but most of two days were consumed by the speech of the Senator from North Dakota. I, myself, intended to speak not more than an hour and a half, but the questions put to me extended my remarks to about four hours and a half.

Mr. EDGE. Has the Senator from Pennsylvania concluded his presentation?

Mr. REED. Yes; for the present.

FARM RELIEF—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1) to establish a Federal farm board to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, and to place agriculture on a basis of economic equality with other industries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the motion made by the Senator from Oregon shall be agreed to, will the conference report displace the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; it will simply serve as an interruption to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether it is his intention to proceed this afternoon with the consideration of the report, or merely to bring it before the Senate?

Mr. McNARY. If I am successful in having the status of the conference report fixed, I shall yield to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who desires an executive session, and ask the Senate to proceed to-morrow at 12 o'clock with the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that after the executive session, it is contemplated that a recess or adjournment will be taken. I have no objection.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. NYE. Will the Senator from Indiana permit me to make a unanimous-consent proposal, before a motion is made to go into executive session?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Oregon, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on H. R. 1.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF THE IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at 3 o'clock on next Monday afternoon debate upon the unfinished business before the Senate shall be limited to five minutes, and that a vote shall follow as soon after that hour as is possible.

Mr. REED. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will not the Senator withhold his motion and yield to me a moment?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I ask unanimous consent that, starting at 3 o'clock on next Tuesday afternoon, the Senate be limited in debate to five minutes upon the unfinished business, and that then a vote shall be taken.

Mr. HEFLIN. I object.

Mr. WATSON. I renew my motion.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, before that motion is made I would like to ask those who are opposed to the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota whether, in view of all that was stated some time ago about the length of time the debate would probably consume, and the possibility of getting a vote on it in the very near future, they would not make some counteroffer of a time when a vote could be had? It does not seem to me that it is quite in keeping with the negotiations which were entered into at that time that objection should be made to any proposal offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. REED. I do not remember any negotiations. I was asked whether I would object to the motion to take up the resolution and I said I would not. I kept that agreement, and made no opposition to taking up the resolution and making it the unfinished business, and I expressed the belief that the debate would last about two days. It is perfectly evident now that it lasted longer than that. I do not want to enter into any agreement at this time.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield further?

Mr. WATSON. A little further.

Mr. BINGHAM. On Wednesday morning last a unanimous-consent request was agreed to that the unfinished business might be laid aside, and another matter taken up, because the Senator from Pennsylvania was not ready to go on with it at that time. We ought to have a vote.

Mr. BORAH. We have all summer.

Mr. WATSON. I hope not.

Mr. MOSES. We have it nominally.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I move——

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WATSON. How much longer does the Senator want me to yield?

Mr. NYE. I want just about two minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I do not believe that the best of faith is being shown in this matter, and the reason for that statement I think it is not necessary for me to call to the attention of the Senate. I want to say that if a vote were permitted at this hour upon the pending resolution it would carry. I can not look upon the opposition to an agreement for an hour to vote upon the resolution as anything other than an admission of defeat and a desire to filibuster it through to the recess which is about to be taken at this special session of the Congress.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. REED. I have talked with a number of Members of this body, and I am perfectly certain that if a vote were taken on this matter at this time, the unfinished business would be defeated.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then why not have a vote? I suggest the calling of the roll.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Let the roll be called.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 45 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, June 8, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, June 7, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, while angels praise Thee we would seek Thy favor. O Thou loving Father, whose open hands give blessings of compassion and forgiveness, lift us into the sunlight and bid us face the open sky; inspire us with the broad vision. Keep us in perfect proportion and in complete contact with Thee. Bless every silent advance, every defense of the truth, every combat with sin, and every triumph over wrong. Dear Lord God, do Thou make the glorified cross the undisputed throne of mankind. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FREIGHT RATES ON WHEAT FOR EXPORT

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. A few days ago, erroneously or otherwise, a resolution which I introduced, House Joint Resolution 95, was referred to a nonfunctioning committee. I think the resolution was properly referred, but my parliamentary inquiry is, Would it be right and proper for me now to ask the pleasure of the Speaker to refer this resolution to a functioning committee—for instance, the Committee on Agriculture?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of the subject matter.

Mr. HOWARD. The resolution instructs the Interstate Commerce Commission to immediately put into effect the same rates on wheat for export that are now granted to steel products for export.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would not be good parliamentary procedure to make such a reference.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposal of business on the Speaker's table, I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

ADDRESS OF HON. ROBERT S. HALL

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address by my colleague, Mr. HALL, of Mississippi, on the 4th day of June before the United Daughters of the Confederacy on Jefferson Davis.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address by Hon. ROBERT S. HALL, of Mississippi, on June 4, 1929, before the United Daughters of the Confederacy on Jefferson Davis.

The address is as follows:

JEFFERSON DAVIS

To the members of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, ladies, and gentlemen, I esteem it one of the greatest honors yet conferred upon me to receive an invitation from you to deliver an address on the one hundred and twenty-first birthday of the greatest Mississippian, Jefferson Davis.

I am mindful there is very little I can say of this great man that has not already been said, and been said by speakers more able than I.

Jefferson Davis stands without a superior as a soldier, statesman, and martyr. He came from a great lineage. He came from two racial stocks unexcelled in the annals of history for bravery, honesty, and fidelity. On his paternal side he came from the Welsh and on his maternal side from the Scotch. His grandfather immigrated to America and settled in Pennsylvania. In those early days the trend of immigration was southward, and as an ambitious young man we find him in South Carolina. True to the fidelity of his race, he shouldered arms in defense of America in the American Revolution. He was the father of an only son, Samuel Davis, who grew into manhood during the formation of American ideals and American principles. This son married a Scotch lady, and after the birth of eight children of this union we find he moved to Kentucky and there was born the president of the Confederacy. It is interesting to note that soon after his birth, and within a few miles therefrom, was also born one of the great Presidents of the United States, Abraham Lincoln. Each was born in the pioneer regions and each grew into manhood during the hardy pioneer days of this Republic. When Jefferson Davis was less than 1 year old his father and the large family left Kentucky and located near Woodville, Miss., where young Jefferson Davis attended the neighborhood school. At the age of 14 he was entered in Transylvania College, Louisville, Ky., and there he remained until he was 17 years of age, when he was appointed a cadet in West Point Military Academy by Congressman Rankin, of Mississippi. It seems that he and Abraham Lincoln were both tutored in the rugged pioneer honesty and virtue that prevailed in that epoch. American history does not record the lives, the service, and the worth of any two characters whose virtue, honesty, and chivalry surpass that of these stars of American genius.

Providence seems to have endowed Jefferson Davis with all the attributes of greatness—in personal appearance, in demeanor, in brilliancy, in oratory, military genius, and statesmanship. He seems to have received his full measure from the Creator and Maker of men. As a student he was ever punctual, studious, and obedient. His great ability seems not to have gone in any particular direction but in all. He seems to have been well balanced at every point or angle. It is said that his love of literature and his constant devotion to it, aside from the regular curriculum of the academy, absorbed enough of his time to prevent him from graduating at the head of his class, although we find he graduated a high medium, well balanced in all the requirements of the collegiate course. After graduating from West Point in 1828 he was commissioned as second lieutenant in the Regular Army, and spent seven laborious years in the military service, chiefly in the middle Northwest. In 1835 he resigned from the Regular Army and married the charming daughter of Gen. Zachary Taylor, one of the beautiful, accomplished southern belles of that day. In his marrying begins the incomprehensible, strange, mysterious thread of tragedy that seems to have woven in and out along with the happiness, successes, and victories of his conspicuous life. It seems that into his life more clouds and showers mingled than in the lives of most other great men. We realize that in the life of all "some rain must fall, some clouds must hover," the nights as well as the days, the Decembers as well as the Junes, must come. We must believe that the decree of Him who guides us in order that the chaff may be separated from the grain, in order that we may render the greatest service to mankind, ordains this mysterious arrangement. It seems a certain way to eliminate self and to augment crystal service. Why General Taylor objected to the marriage has never been revealed by our historians, but his opposition to this union was so expressed and so determined that after this beautiful southern belle and the most promising son of the South were united in wedlock the father and daughter never met.

After their marriage the young couple settled immediately on a plantation of a thousand acres of rich land in south Mississippi near the Mississippi River. He intended to devote his life as a plantation owner, both he and his wife dreaming and planning of the ease of a cultured life beneath the southern skies, amid the natural enchantment of that beautiful section. Yet less than a year after these fond hopes and plans were formed they were both taken suddenly ill and she passed into the beyond.

With his fondest anticipations temporarily blasted and his health impaired, he went to Cuba for a sojourn, but returned later to the plantation of his brother, where seven long years were spent in study and preparation for his great life. Jefferson Davis occupies a unique position in national politics. He voluntarily left the House of Representatives to answer the Nation's call to battle for his country's honor, and later voluntarily left a Senate seat vacated to answer the call of the Southland. One of his master mind, thorough preparation, and exalted statecraft, although apparently in seclusion after his wife's death, was not overlooked by his countrymen, and at the age of 36 he was sent to Congress as a Representative of his congressional district. No young Congressman ever came to Washington more superbly equipped or more readily took leading rank than he. Although occupying this seat less than a year, he became one of the great leaders in oratory and statesmanship. But as much as this Nation seemed so signally to need him in this branch of his country's service, the war with Mexico was on, and Jefferson Davis, believing his country's interest called him to the perilous duty of the battle field rather than the alluring atmosphere of the Halls of Congress, we find him resigning his seat, returning to his beloved Southland, and becoming colonel of the greatest arm of the Republic's Army on the plains of Mexico. His military training had taught him the necessity of equipping and training an army. The unsurpassed valor, discipline, and generalship of his division of that great army saved the day at Monterey and on the fields of Buena Vista, and but for the participation of Jefferson Davis in that struggle the history of the war with Mexico might have been written in chapters much less complimentary to our Republic. Having so signally immortalized himself in this great war, he retired again to his plantation life with the hope that he might live the remainder of his days in quiet and in the peaceful pursuit of his literary delight. But ere long Mississippi called him again to the legislative halls of our Nation. He went this time as a United States Senator and entered the greatest deliberative body on earth when the glory of this great Chamber was at its height. Possibly never at one time had so many illustrious men sat in the highest councils of the Nation. Among the great who sat there were: John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina; Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts; Henry Clay, of Kentucky; Thomas H. Benton of Missouri; Louis Cass, of Michigan; and Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois.

In that great company of giants Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, at once took rank among the greatest. "Eloquent among the most eloquent in debate; the most accomplished Member of the body." One of the best authorities of that day says of him: "It is but simple justice to say that in ripe scholarship, wide and accurate information on all subjects coming before the body, native ability, readiness as a debater, true honor, and stainless character, Jefferson Davis stood in the very first rank, and did as much to influence legislation and leave his mark on the Senate and the country as any other who served in his day." He was a consistent advocate of the doctrine of state rights. He took the position that had been taken by Massachusetts and by Connecticut, and by those who afterwards denominated him a traitor, that this Union was composed of separate, independent, sovereign States, and that the Federal power was delegated and limited. He expressed his views in these concise words: "Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled." Time does not permit me to go into detail on the many issues and great debates of that period, but it is sufficient to say that any student of history or those who have taken the pains to read and classify the great men of that assembly, if fair, will accord Jefferson Davis a place second to none. His enemies, who were too ignorant to know the real man, have denominated him a traitor and have accused him of being the prime mover and instigator of the sentiment that culminated in the bloody war of the States. Happy are we who are familiar with his life, who know and understand his great heart beats, and recognize in him the love of peace, and are delighted this base accusation is rapidly fading away, and that the intelligent and informed of our day are rapidly placing him on the high pedestal of a lover of peace and one desiring to avoid this bloody conflict.

The strongest position that he maintained was the South would never surrender its position on State rights, and that if the remainder of the Nation was not willing to dwell in union with the South, maintaining this constitutional guaranty, that it was better that the Union separated and that the discordant elements segregated themselves into independent Commonwealths. During this heated, turbulent debate, and before he bid adieu to the Senate which he so signally honored, he uttered these words, which is conclusive proof of his noble position:

"If the folly and fanaticism and pride and hate and corruption of the day are to destroy the peace and prosperity of the Union, let the sections part like the patriarchs of old and let peace and good will subsist among their descendants. Let no wounds be inflicted which time may not heal. Let the flag of our Union be folded up entire, the 13 stripes recording the original size of our family, untorn by the unholy struggle of civil war."

Jefferson Davis was twice honored with a seat in the United States Senate. During the interregnum between his first service and his last, he was appointed by President Pierce as Secretary of War and served for four years. Our great Nation can not boast of a more efficient, constructive execution of the War Department than the four years under Jefferson Davis. It was under his direction that the beautiful Capitol was completed. It was he who designed and placed on the dome of the Capitol its present emblem. If time permitted, I would like to detail many of the policies he inaugurated for the beautification and completeness of the Capital of our Nation. At the present we read and hear of the services of others in this direction, and I realize that the sectional feeling is not yet so dead but the services of Jefferson Davis in this direction are temporarily eclipsed, but when all the history of the Nation has been written, and all the great men have been fairly numbered, and the great phalanx of American patriots are in full view, then the services of Jefferson Davis will be written high on the scroll of his country's honored.

I haven't the time to recount his varied policies and execution of the presidency of the Confederacy. It has been conceded by his bitterest enemy that no republic was ever blessed with a stronger head than was the Confederate States. In the organization of the civil and military powers in a republic of agricultural States, where plants and factories were unknown and with the ports of the world closed against it, the army that he organized and sent forth in defense of his country is unparalleled and unequaled in all the history of the world.

Hon. B. G. Lowery, for many years a great Congressman of my State, in an address at Arlington Cemetery, well said: "The wonder is not that the Confederacy fell, but that it fell at the end of four years instead of six months. The fact significant is not that there were occasional places where the civil and the military failed to coordinate, but that they coordinated anywhere. The marvel is, and it is one of the marvels of history, that Jefferson Davis, without money, without equipment, with nothing but his own strength and wisdom, beset by malicious critics everywhere and by friendly critics in his own councils, gave to the southern armies a civil backing in which any government might pride itself."

After the fall of the Confederacy upon the surrender of the peerless Lee the brutal treatment of this chieftain by his vicious political enemies will forever remain the blackest blot on the escutcheon of this Republic. Yet his bravery, fortitude, and uncomplaining suffering writes his name in the blood of his fallen army, in fame's eternal history a martyr unsurpassed and, I believe, unequaled.

Not only did Jefferson Davis lose his political prestige, his fortune, and his health in the crash of the South, but during those dark days he lost two of his sons, and soon after the close of the bloody conflict his other son was taken by the cold hand of death. Still his spirit rises buoyant, hopeful, and undaunted. By the generous hand of a wealthy benefactor he was bequeathed a magnificent home on the shore of the beautiful seaboard of Mississippi—the land of flowers and of hope, of brave men, beautiful, virtuous women—eternally wafted by the sea breezes of the Mexican Gulf, amid the enchanting shades of that fair region whose magnanimous people I have the honor to represent as a Member of Congress. There assembled the remnants of his once happy family, retiring for the peace of his old age. This home is now the State home of Confederate veterans and their wives, here, in their declining days, their hearts and lips in attune with the fresh breezes, daily echo in sweet cadence their undying love for the vanquished hero.

But the loving hearts of his adopted Mississippians were not content for him to dwell in ease, but for the third time offered him a seat in the Senate of the United States, but being conscious of the bitterness of other sections of the Nation, he feared his presence again in the Senate would militate against the interest of his Commonwealth. So true to the loyalty of his soul, he declined this honor.

Let me pay a just tribute to the noble women composing the United Daughters of the Confederacy. It is not your purpose to minimize or undervalue the valor or sacred ideals of those who opposed us. Your motives are of higher birth. They are to perpetuate and keep ever afresh the lofty ideals and principles underlying the causes, deeds, and actions of the Confederacy. In doing this you do not dim the luster of those who differed. You, as do I, wish them the most sublime happiness in perpetuating the memory of their cause and their loved ones departed. I am happy that I possess no bitterness toward the victors of this bloody vortex, but I am frank to say the multiplying years augment my belief in the eternal justness of our cause and the rectitude of those who followed the footsteps of the hero of this occasion. I but wish for the dawning of that beautiful day when the small remaining dark cloud of sectional hate which but dulls the otherwise beautiful firmament of this the greatest republic shall have floated far beyond the vision of every American citizen; and there silently yield its blightening gloom in the measureless ethereal of eternity, never to show its repulsive presence anew.

I thank God I am the proud father of five red-blooded American sons whose paternal grandfather wore the gray and whose maternal grandfather wore the blue. In equal proportion they glory in the surpassing heroism of the conflicting causes. They can enthusiastically join in the sentiment so beautifully expressed by George Morrow Mayo:

"Here's to the blue of the wind-swept North
When we meet on the fields of France;
May the spirit of Grant be with you all
As the sons of the North advance.

"Here's to the gray of the sun-kissed South
When we meet on the fields of France;
May the spirit of Lee be with you all
As the sons of the South advance.

"And here's to the blue and the gray as one
When we meet on the fields of France;
May the spirit of God be with us all
As the sons of the Flag advance."

Let me close these remarks with a quotation from an address delivered by Bishop Charles B. Galloway, of Mississippi, at the University of Mississippi on the 3d day of June, 1908, whose brilliant tribute to the life and character of Jefferson Davis was closed with these eloquent words:

"Greatest of Mississippians, the leader of our armies, the defender of our liberties, the expounder of our political creeds, the authoritative voice of our hopes and fears, the sufferer for our sins, if sins they were, and the willing martyr to our sacred cause—we shall ever speak his name with reverence and cherish with patriotic pride the story of his matchless deeds. He died without citizenship here, but he has become a fellow citizen with the heroes of the skies.

"Marvelous, many-sided, masterful man, his virtues will grow brighter and his name be written larger with each passing century. Soldier, hero, statesmen, gentleman, American—a prince of Christian chivalry—the uncrowned chief of an invisible republic of loving and loyal hearts—when another hundred years have passed, no intelligent voice will fail to praise him, and no patriotic hand will refuse to place a laurel wreath upon his radiant brow.

"'Nothing need cover his high fame but heaven,
No pyramid set off his memories
But the eternal substance of his greatness,
To which I leave him.'"

HON. THOMAS C. M'RAE

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a sketch of the life and character of the late Thomas C. McRae, of Arkansas, who was for many years a Member of this House and represented the district that I have the honor to represent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, on June 2, 1929, Hon. Thomas C. McRae, at the age of 77 years, 6 months, 2 days, departed this life at his home at Prescott, Ark. Mr. McRae was born at Mt. Holly, Union County, Ark., December 21, 1851. He attended private school in Shady Grove, Columbia County, Ark., and graduated from the Soule Business School, New Orleans, La., in 1869 and from the law school at Washington and Lee University, Lexington, Va., in 1872. The following year he was admitted to the bar and began the practice of law in Rosston, Nevada County, Ark.

In 1874 he was appointed election commissioner of his home county and served three years. He was elected to the State house of representatives in 1877, in which year he moved from Rosston to Prescott, to which latter place the county seat had been moved. In 1880 he was presidential elector on the Democratic ticket for Hancock and English, and was chairman of the Democratic State convention in 1884 and 1902, was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention at Chicago in 1884. He was elected to the House of Representatives as a Democrat in the Forty-ninth Congress to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Hon. James K. Jones, and was reelected to the Fiftieth and to the seven succeeding Congresses, serving from December 7, 1885, until March 3, 1903, when he voluntarily retired to resume the practice of law and engage in the banking business at Prescott, Ark. He was president of the Arkansas Bankers Association in 1909–10, and chairman of the committee that prepared the Arkansas banking law, and was president of the Arkansas Bankers Association in 1918–19, and a member of the Arkansas Constitutional Convention in 1918. He served as Governor of Arkansas from January 14, 1921, to 1925, and was elected a life member of the Arkansas State Democratic convention in 1926. Governor McRae came to Congress when a very young man and soon became known as one of the ablest and most diligent Members of the House. He was a member of the Committee on Public Lands at a time when the Federal Government held title to enormous areas of the public domain. Many citizens of the United States made claim to ownership of some of these lands. Mr. McRae succeeded in bringing order out of chaos and won a national reputation by the businesslike manner in which he settled the claims for both the Government and the claimants. During the years he was a Member of the House he grew in the affection and esteem of men who knew him.

After 18 years of continuous service here he retired to private life. As a Democrat he was regarded not only as the head of the Democratic Party in Arkansas but an outstanding Democrat nationally. Time after time the party called him in an advisory capacity when his counsel was needed to keep the ship of state properly on its course. Day after day he gave his services without thought of reward or personal benefit to himself. In 1920 the people of the State called him once more to active service, and at an election held at that time he was nominated on the Democratic ticket for governor and on the following November was overwhelmingly elected. He served for four years, and from the time that the State overthrew carpet-bag rule under the leadership of Gov. Augustus H. Garland to the present time no man has served with greater honor, more distinction, or has done more for the State than Gov. Thomas C. McRae. At the end of his term of four years as governor he was strongly urged, for the good of the State, to accept a third term but resolutely declined. During his administration the public-school system of Arkansas was put upon a firm basis. As long as time lasts the great school system in Arkansas that he so materially aided will be a monument to him. No man has ever retired from the office of governor with greater honor and higher esteem of his people than he. The enemies he made because of his courage and strong adherence to duty soon became his most ardent supporters and admirers. At the time of his death his influence was greater than that of any man who lived in the State. He was a man without guile, and in public office his sole purpose was to serve his people without a thought of the possible political effect to himself.

During the administration of President Wilson he attended a meeting of the American Bankers' Association at Boston. Of all the delegates that attended he was the only man who supported President Wilson's Federal reserve policy. He boldly stood in that convention and raised his voice in favor of the Wilson policy. Throughout his entire life he was an uncompromising Democrat, who loved his party next to his church and his country.

During the recent campaign, even at his advanced age, he gave splendid service for his party and was in the forefront of the battle line from beginning to end. He was the most uncompromising advocate of States' rights that I ever knew. His fight for Democracy began at a time when he was but a boy and his home county had a large third party, and he never quit the fight for Democracy until his party was supreme and unopposed there.

The death of Governor McRae is not only a loss to his friends, family, and State, but a loss to the Nation. After 77 years of his life, in which he had been a leader in the government of his State and had engaged in every battle of his party, he came to the end without a blemish on his character or a scar on his record. Truly he was a giant and his loss will be felt by us all.

For a half century he was a leader in political, religious, civic, and business affairs of his State, and he stood foursquare to every wind that blew, and around him rallied those who fought for a finer civilization, higher ideals, and a better land. By energy and fine business judgment he accumulated a very comfortable fortune and was one of the most charitable and liberal givers in the State. No worthy cause went empty handed from him.

When all that was mortal of him was laid to rest, representatives from every section of the State came to attest the love and esteem in which he was held. The former pastor of his church, Rev. J. C. Williams, said:

During his course of 51 years in statesmanship he stood foursquare to the world. After 18 years in Congress he returned with an unblemished record of public service and a character unsullied. He was a man unaffected by the mad rush for money. He could not be bought, he could not be bribed, he could not be dishonored.

He gave 54 years of love and loyalty to his wife and to his family. The Nation's strength is built on homes like that. Religion was the basis of his great character. For their religious faith, his ancestors in Scotland suffered martyrdom. Religious liberty to them also meant political liberty. There was no hypocrisy, no deceit about Thomas C. McRae. He was a Christian gentleman, kind, courteous, civil, and dignified, but to-day he has entered through the pearly gates and is seated in the house of God.

The Rev. James R. Winchester, bishop of the Episcopal diocese of Arkansas, expressed my thought of Governor McRae in this beautiful tribute when he said:

In my judgment, Thomas Chipman McRae was one of the finest characters in our public life, an outstanding figure as Congressman, governor, and chairman of the Democratic Party in Arkansas. It was my privilege to know him as a law student in Washington and Lee University. We were associated in the Washington Literary Society at college. He graduated in the law department in one year, having the esteem of professors and students. When he went to Washington to represent Arkansas in Congress, Judge John Randolph Tucker, his law dean, having a seat in the House of Representatives from Virginia, welcomed him with warmest greeting, saying: "You are the first of my boys to meet me here." He cherished that salutation and kept it in his heart through life. His congressional career fulfilled Judge Tucker's expectations as his distinguished course at college had done. Governor McRae was a splendid type of Christian manhood, as exemplified in his patriotic statesmanship with the highest ideals of true American citizenship. All who came into the circle of his friendship realized his loyal consistency in all circumstances. His life has been a benediction to our Commonwealth, inspiring young men to be true and just in all their dealings. Therefore we thank God for his superb example of justice, purity, and honor. Tom McRae should have a monument erected to his sacred memory in the capital of Arkansas, where his illustrious public life stands as a beacon light to our whole country. I have never seen an inconsistency in his well-rounded, completed life.

A staff correspondent of the Arkansas Gazette, in writing of his funeral, said:

It was a great tribute to this native-born Arkansas patriot. In the solemn interlude that lies between the cradle and the grave he had pitched his career so that when he passed into the obscurity that lies beyond the dark curtain of life the leading men and women from the State he loved so devotedly came to mourn with Prescott over the loss of her great citizen.

The 77 years of his active life were recalled here to-day by his neighbors and friends, who remembered him as a stalwart fighter for the truth as he saw it, an unfaltering Democrat, who was, as the poet said:

"Great in council and great in war,
Foremost captain of his time,
Rich in saving common sense,
And in his simplicity sublime."

Thus was Thomas Chipman McRae laid at rest here in peace, strong in his Presbyterian faith, a pattern of the virtues of his age and race, and "in his simplicity sublime."

Mr. Speaker, a great man has gone; a friend whom I loved has passed; as the last immortelle of honor has been laid by the loving hands of a sorrowing people, we will cherish his memory, while his spirit will live forever in the beautiful land of the Leal.

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on prohibition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago I wrote a letter to the New York Curb Exchange, New York City, N. Y., complaining that they were listing for sale stock in the Gooderham & Worts Co. (Ltd.), of Toronto, Canada.

My complaint was based on the fact that the name of the company as listed by the New York Curb Exchange did not show that it was stock in a company that was engaged in the manufacture of whisky. The truth, however, was that this was a whisky concern. I also complained that this firm was engaged in the manufacture of whisky for the purpose of smuggling it into the United States. This concern is better known as Hiram Walker & Co., although that was not the name listed in the New York Curb Exchange. My complaint was that the New York Curb Exchange, as well as stockbrokers engaged in the selling of this stock, were violating the prohibition enforcement act. The prohibition enforcement officers, however, claim that the New York Curb Exchange is not violating the law in listing Canadian distillery stocks. Evidently an amendment to the prohibition enforcement act is necessary in order to prevent the listing of distillery stock and the sale of it by stockbrokers in the United States. At the time I made the complaint to the New York Curb Exchange I stated that there was nothing to show that the stock mentioned was distillery stock. I also stated that I had bought some of the stock from a stock broker concern on the recommendation of a friend connected with it, and that he did not at the time I bought it state that it was whisky stock. I stated that as soon as I learned that fact I sold it. My complaint was misrepresented throughout the country and it was alleged that I was complaining because I lost money in the transaction. That was not the basis of my complaint. The loss I sustained was a very small one. I complained because Canadian distillers and brewers were able to manufacture and smuggle into the United States liquor and beer in large quantities in violation of our own laws, while our own people were prevented from manufacturing liquor or beer for sale in the United States. When I stated in my letter to the New York Curb Exchange that I had bought some stock and sold it at a loss because it was whisky stock I did this merely as an opening wedge to bring it to the attention of the said exchange and the public. I said it was wrong for American stock exchanges to advertise and sell stock to American investors in these liquor concerns in Canada because by doing that they were assisting the Canadian distillers to violate the law by furnishing them money in the sale of stock and which money they could use in smuggling liquor into the United States.

At the time I made the complaint, officials of the concern known as the Gooderham & Worts Co. (Ltd.), otherwise known as the Hiram Walker Co., of Toronto, Canada, were under indictment in the United States courts for liquor smuggling. If the United States Government wishes to enforce the prohibition law they must find some way through Congress or treaties to prevent liquor and beer smuggling into the United States. To make same effective they must have authority under the law to proceed against not only bootleggers who sell the liquor but all other agencies that combine and assist in making it possible for the Canadian distilleries and breweries to smuggle their liquor and beer into the United States, and it should include stock exchanges and stock brokers, who advertise, offer, and sell brewery stock.

The United States grand jury at Buffalo, N. Y., returned indictments on the 4th of December last but nothing has been accomplished to bring the Canadians indicted to trial. It is stated our treaties with Canada do not permit this being done. Until we are able to negotiate such treaties there will not be a let-up in the smuggling of liquor and beer into the United States from Canada. This is our great difficulty in enforcing the prohibition law. When these indictments were returned at Buffalo on December 4 the facts showed that these Canadians were indicted in a plot to flood the United States with liquor and beer. Rum running was on a huge scale. The heads of Gooderham & Worts, which control Hiram Walker whisky and other distilleries and breweries, were names in the indictment. Thirty Canadian firms and individuals were charged with smuggling liquor worth $25,000,000 or more into the United States.

The information as given out at the time these indictments were voted by the grand jury was in substance that the division of foreign control of the prohibition department announced that the investigation was just beginning, while it was reported at Washington that under present treaties Canadians can not be extradited. It was stated, however, the State Department was attempting to arrange a conference with the Canadian customs service for an agreement on a treaty making customs-law violations extraditable.

The indictments handed in without comment and received in silence by Judge Adler specifically charged that the firms and individuals conspired to violate the tariff act of 1892 and section 88 of the national prohibition law.

This section relates to conspiracy and carries a term of imprisonment to those found guilty under its provisions.

For weeks the jury had been receiving evidence presented by United States Attorney Richard H. Templeton. The evidence was based on reports submitted by a large number of special investigators who came to Buffalo last summer, when certain customs and immigration men were caught dealing in freight-car seals and participating in a conspiracy to pass liquor-laden cars into this country from Canada.

Foremost among those indicted was Harry C. Hatch, millionaire chairman of the board of Gooderham & Worts (Ltd.), of Toronto, and the Hiram Walker Co., of Windsor. Both companies were recently merged to create the largest distilling organization in the world, and they are named in the indictments. Others indicted are: Herbert C. Hatch and Larry J. McGuinness, members of the liquor brokerage firm of Hatch & McGuinness; Edward T. Sandell, president of the Taylor & Bate Brewery, St. Catherines, Ontario; C. A. Savard, Windsor, Ontario; Jules Thibideau, Port Lambton, Ontario; Stanley B. Sutton, Simcoe, Ontario; Frank S. Harris; Lionel L. Sinclair; John J. Fitzpatrick; A. Smith; D. Chulack; W. Rynols, alias W. Reynolds; J. Meyers; Morris Green; David Caplan; Louis Harris; Fred H. Boyd; James Harris; J. Thompson; J. Penna; James Johnson; R. Robinson; W. Dingman; George McDermott; Charles Curmer; A. Travernor; Joseph Burke; and J. Watson.

The indictments reported were declared to be the opening gun in a major war which the Washington authorities proposed to wage against what is called a big Canadian smuggling ring, said to have shipped into the United States liquor of the value of many millions of dollars.

The Hiram Walker-Gooderham Co. (Ltd.) is listed on the New York Curb Exchange and its shares have been widely purchased by American investors.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HALL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing some extracts from an article in the Country Gentleman on the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ACT

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 1.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1) to establish a Federal farm board, to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, and to place agriculture on a basis of economic equality with other industries.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement.

The statement was read.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1) to establish a Federal farm board to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, and to place agriculture on a basis of economic equality with other industries, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"DECLARATION OF POLICY

"SECTION 1. (a) That it is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, so that the industry of agriculture will be placed on a basis of economic equality with other industries, and to that end to protect, control, and stabilize the currents of interstate and foreign commerce in the marketing of agricultural commodities and their food products—

"(1) by minimizing speculation.

"(2) by preventing inefficient and wasteful methods of distribution.

"(3) by encouraging the organization of producers into effective associations or corporations under their own control for greater unity of effort in marketing and by promoting the establishment and financing of a farm marketing system of producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperative associations and other agencies.

"(4) by aiding in preventing and controlling surpluses in any agricultural commodity, through orderly production and distribution, so as to maintain advantageous domestic markets and prevent such surpluses from causing undue and excessive fluctuations or depressions in prices for the commodity.

"(b) There shall be considered as a surplus for the purposes of this act any seasonal or year's total surplus, produced in the United States and either local or national in extent, that is in excess of the requirements for the orderly distribution of the agricultural commodity or is in excess of the domestic requirements for such commodity.

"(c) The Federal farm board shall execute the powers vested in it by this act only in such manner as will, in the judgment of the board, aid to the fullest practicable extent in carrying out the policy above declared.

"FEDERAL FARM BOARD

"SEC. 2. A Federal farm board is hereby created, which shall consist of eight members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and of the Secretary of Agriculture ex officio. In making the appointments the President shall give due consideration to having the major agricultural commodities produced in the United States fairly represented upon the board. The terms of office of the appointed members of the board first taking office after the date of the approval of this act shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of nomination, two at the end of the first year, two at the end of the second year, one at the end of the third year, one at the end of the fourth year, one at the end of the fifth year, and one at the end of the sixth year after such date. A successor to an appointed member of the board shall have a term of office expiring six years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy in the board occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, shall be appointed for the remainder of such term. One of the appointed members shall be designated by the President as chairman of the board and shall be the principal executive officer thereof. The board shall select a vice chairman who shall act as chairman in case of the absence or disability of the chairman. The board may function notwithstanding vacancies, and a majority of the appointed members in office shall constitute a quorum. Each appointed member shall be a citizen of the United States and shall not actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as a member of the board; nor shall any appointed member during his term of office engage in the business (except such business as is necessary to the operation of his own farm or farms) of buying and selling, or otherwise be financially interested in, any agricultural commodity or product thereof. Each appointed member shall receive a salary of $12,000 a year, together with necessary traveling and subsistence expenses, or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law, while away from his official station upon official business.

"ADVISORY COMMODITY COMMITTEES

"SEC. 3. (a) The board is authorized to designate, from time to time, as an agricultural commodity for the purposes of this act (1) any regional or market classification or type of any agricultural commodity which is so different in use or marketing methods from other such classifications or types of the commodity as to require, in the judgment of the board, treatment as a separate commodity under this act; or (2) any two or more agricultural commodities which are so closely related in use or marketing methods as to require, in the judgment of the board, joint treatment as a single commodity under this act.

"(b) The board shall invite the cooperative associations handling any agricultural commodity to establish an advisory commodity committee to consist of seven members, of whom at least two shall be experienced handlers or processors of the commodity, to represent such commodity before the board in matters relating to the commodity. Members of each advisory committee shall be selected by the cooperative associations from time to time in such manner as the board shall prescribe. No salary shall be paid to committee members, but the board shall pay each a per diem compensation not exceeding $20 for attending committee meetings called by the board and for time devoted to other business of the committee authorized by the board, and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses, or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law for civilian employees in the executive branch of the Government. Each advisory committee shall be designated by the name of the commodity it represents, as, for example, the 'cotton advisory committee.'

"(c) Each advisory committee shall meet as soon as practicable after its selection, at a time and place designated by the board. Each advisory committee shall meet thereafter at least twice a year upon call of the board, and may meet at other times upon call of a majority of the members thereof. Each advisory committee shall select a chairman and secretary.

"(d) Each advisory committee may by itself or through its officers, (1) confer directly with the board, call for information from it, or make oral or written representations to it, concerning matters within the jurisdiction of the board and relating to the agricultural commodity, and (2) cooperate with the board in advising the producers through their organizations or otherwise in the development of suitable programs of planting or breeding in order to secure the maximum benefits under this act consistent with the policy declared in section 1.

"GENERAL POWERS OF BOARD

"SEC. 4. The board—

"(1) shall maintain its principal office in the District of Columbia, and such other offices in the United States as in its judgment are necessary.

"(2) shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

"(3) shall make an annual report to Congress upon the administration of this act and any other matter relating to the better effectuation of the policy declared in section 1, including recommendations for legislation.

"(4) may make such regulations as are necessary to execute the functions vested in it by this act.

"(5) may appoint and fix the salaries of a secretary and such experts, and, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended, and subject to the provisions of the civil service laws, such other officers and employees, as are necessary to execute such functions.

"(6) may make such expenditures (including expenditures for rent and personal services at the seat of government and elsewhere, for law books, periodicals, and books of reference, and for printing and binding) as are necessary to execute such functions. Expenditures by the board shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the board.

"(7) shall meet at the call of the chairman, the Secretary of Agriculture, or a majority of its members.

"SPECIAL POWERS OF BOARD

"SEC. 5. The board is authorized and directed—

"(1) to promote education in the principles and practices of cooperative marketing of agricultural commodities and food products thereof.

"(2) to encourage the organization, improvement in methods, and development of effective cooperative associations.

"(3) to keep advised from any available sources and make reports as to crop prices, experiences, prospects, supply, and demand, at home and abroad.

"(4) to investigate conditions of overproduction of agricultural commodities and advise as to the prevention of such overproduction.

"(5) to make investigations and reports and publish the same, including investigations and reports upon the following: Land utilization for agricultural purposes; reduction of the acreage of unprofitable marginal lands in cultivation; methods of expanding markets at home and abroad for agricultural commodities and food products thereof; methods of developing by-products of and new uses for agricultural commodities; and transportation conditions and their effect upon the marketing of agricultural commodities.

"REVOLVING FUND

"SEC. 6. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $500,000,000 which shall be made available by the Congress as soon as practicable after the approval of this act and shall constitute a revolving fund to be administered by the board as provided in this act.

"LOANS TO COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS

"SEC. 7. (a) Upon application by any cooperative association the board is authorized to make loans to it from the revolving fund to assist in—

"(1) the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities and food products thereof;

"(2) the construction or acquisition by purchase or lease of physical marketing facilities for preparing, handling, storing, processing, or merchandising agricultural commodities or their food products;

"(3) the formation of clearing-house associations;

"(4) extending membership of the cooperative association applying for the loan by educating the producers of the commodity handled by the association in the advantages of cooperative marketing of that commodity; and

"(5) enabling the cooperative association applying for the loan to advance to its members a greater share of the market price of the commodity delivered to the association than is practicable under other credit facilities.

"(b) No loan shall be made to any cooperative association unless, in the judgment of the board, the loan is in furtherance of the policy declared in section 1 and the cooperative association applying for the loan has an organization and management, and business policies, of such character as to insure the reasonable safety of the loan and the furtherance of such policy.

"(c) Loans for the construction or acquisition by purchase or lease of physical facilities shall be subject to the following limitations:

"(1) No such loan for the construction or purchase of such facilities shall be made in an amount in excess of 80 per cent of the value of the facilities to be constructed or purchased.

"(2) No loan for the purchase or lease of such facilities shall be made unless the board finds that the purchase price or rent to be paid is reasonable.

"(3) No loan for the construction, purchase, or lease of such facilities shall be made unless the board finds that there are not available suitable existing facilities that will furnish their services to the cooperative association at reasonable rates; and in addition to the preceding limitation, no loan for the construction of facilities shall be made unless the board finds that suitable existing facilities are not available for purchase or lease at a reasonable price or rent.
